vious to my calling for the previous question, and no objection was made. I am disposed to admit the amendment, although I shall vote against the bill under existing circumstances.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's amendment did not form a part of the committee's report, and was not, therefore, in order, except by unanimous consent; and the gentleman from Tennessee objects to its introduction.

Mr. CARTTER. Is it in order to move a reconsideration to the second to the call for the previous question, with a view to the introduction of the amendment?

The SPEAKER. After the gentleman has reconsidered all the intermediate votes of the House it will be in order.

Mr. CARTTER. Do I understand the Chair to state this amendment was offered before the call for the previous question?

The SPEAKER. It was not in order to submit the amendment; for the reason that there were a number of amendments already pending, which were reported from the Ways and Means Committee; and, until they were disposed of, this amendment could not be in order.

Mr. CARTTER. Was objection interposed to its introduction at that time?

The SPEAKER. It was not received in order at that time. The Chair so stated. There can be no question in regard to the point of order.

The bill as amended was then ordered to a third reading; and, being read a third time, and the amendments engrossed, was passed.

Mr. MARSHALL, of California. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the House refused to adjourn.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE AGAIN.

Mr. MARSHALL, of California. I rise to a privileged motion. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House postponed the consideration of the Pennsylvania contested-election case to a day certain.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I trust that will not be done. I do not see the chairman or the members of his committee in their seats.

Mr. HOUSTON. Were I aware of the desire of gentlemen to consider this contested-election case, I would not have submitted the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole. I withdraw my motion.

The question was then put on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the Pennsylvania contested-election case was postponed; and upon a division, there were—ayes 82, noes 59.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia, demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. ALLISON, moved that the House do now adjourn; which motion was agreed to.

And the House therefore adjourned till to-morrow, at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, June 23, 1852.

Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Interior, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate for information whether any steps were taken to investigate the charges preferred by Colonel McClellan against the Commissioner to run and mark the boundary between the United States and Mexico; stating that there had been no regular arraignment and trial of the Commissioner to run and mark the boundary line between the United States and Mexico on the charges preferred against him by Colonel McClellan, but that the Secretary of the Interior did, however, make such an investigation of them as to satisfy himself that they were preferred under such circumstances, and sustained by such testimony as not to demand a more formal examination.

The report was ordered to be laid on the table and printed.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of War, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 19th instant for information in relation to the construction of a canal across the peninsula of Florida, transmitting a report of Colonel J. J. Abert, of the Bureau of Topographical Engineers, in answer to the above resolution, and referring to public documents containing the information called for; which was ordered to be laid on the table and printed.

Maxwell, praying to be allowed the difference between the pay of an assistant surgeon and that of a surgeon on board the United States ship Cyane, from December 22, 1845, to the 24th of May, 1848, during which time he performed the duties of surgeon; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BRODHEAD presented the memorial of Robert Bell and others, praying a modification of the late bounty land law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, the memorial of A. W. H. Paine, praying indemnity for spoiliations by the French prior to 1800; which was ordered to be laid on the table.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. CLEMENS, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the petition of Jefferson Wilson, administrator of Hannah A. Wray, deceased, reported a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. SOULE, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill to improve the navigation of the Upper Mississippi, reported back the same with an amendment.

Mr. FELCH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred sundry memorials praying for a modification of the bounty land law, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the memorial of the Board of Education of the State of Michigan, a petition of the present and late officers of the land office at Iowa, Iowa; the memorial of D. M. Smith; the memorial of the Board of Trustees of the Protestant University of the United States, at Cincinnati, Ohio; and the memorial of the Trustees of the Miami University, praying grants of land for educational purposes; together with a resolution of the Legislature of Massachusetts, in favor of an appropriation of public land to establish and endow a National Normal Agricultural College, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof.

On the subject of these grants of land to separate institutions, the honorable gentleman said, a report was made last year, showing that the whole matter had been thoroughly investigated; and the view of the committee is, that the grants for this purpose having always heretofore been made to States, and not to different institutions, they recommend that the same course be adopted now.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FELCH also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill to authorize payment by the surveyor general of California for the surveys which may be executed, of any claims which have been or may be presented to the Board of Land Commissioners for adjudication, under the act of Congress, approved the 2d March, 1851, to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California, reported back the same with amendments.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred a message from the President of the United States, with a report of the Secretary of State, accompanied by a communication from the Spanish Minister, claiming indemnity for Spanish subjects who sustained injury in the popular tumult at New Orleans, in August last, submitted a report, accompanied by a joint resolution for the relief of the Spanish Consul, and other subjects of Spain, residing at New Orleans, and of subjects of Spain residing at Key West, by indemnity for losses occasioned by the violence of the mob in the year 1851; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

CASE OF MARY WOODWARD.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the petition of Mary Woodward, widow of a lieutenant in the revenue service, praying a pension, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for her relief; which was read, and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. GWIN. I hope the Senate will permit me to ask the consideration of that bill now. It grants but a small pension, and was drawn up in strict conformity with the recommendation of the Auditor. The pension is asked for in consequence of the loss of the husband of the petitioner, by drowning, while engaged in the public service, in California. I am exceedingly anxious that it should be acted upon now, and I hope the unanimous consent of the Senate will be given. The chairman of the committee knows that the bill is drawn up in strict conformity with the recommendation of the Auditor.

There being no objection made, the bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to give authority to the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension roll the name of Mary Woodward, widow of Lieutenant Woodward, (who was drowned in California on the 5th of November, 1850,) at the rate of $30 per month, to continue to be paid to her during her widowhood; and after her death or intermarriage, to be paid to her children, until they arrive at the age of sixteen years, according to the provisions of the act of 11th August, 1848.

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not want to object to that bill, but I would like to have something like uniformity in matters of this kind. This, however, is a bill which I think goes a little further than anything which has ever come before the Senate.

Mr. GWIN. Will the Senator from Illinois be good enough to state in what respect this bill is different from anything that has ever come before the Senate?

Mr. SHIELDS. It gives a pension of $30 per month to the widow of a revenue officer, during her widowhood; and then gives it to her children, after her marriage, until they are sixteen years of age. I am quite willing that we should have a general law embracing similar cases. I see great difficulty in legislating upon these particular cases. This goes further than anything that has yet come before the Senate, so far as my experience goes. It is well known that I never make any objection to subjects of this kind, unless I have reason to fear that other equally meritorious cases may be injured thereby. If we go too far I fear there may be a reaction. That is what I dread.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. The Committee on Pensions have already, I think, reported a bill, or, at all events, have instructed the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Geyer] to report a general bill giving pensions for life to the widows, as long as they remain such, and to their children, if they marry again, of those who lost their lives in the service of their country. That bill, I believe, will not authorize the payment of a pension to the widow of an officer in the revenue service, and hence it is, that we report a special bill in this case. There is no objection, in the mind of the committee, as to the propriety of giving the pension, and I hope the bill will be passed now.

Mr. GWIN. This bill is for a particular claim which has been recommended by the Auditor, and it is drawn up in exact accordance with his recommendation. It was framed in his office. He says it is a meritorious claim, and ought to be paid. I have here his letter; and the bill, as I have said, has been drawn up in exact accordance with it, and has reference to the law of 1848. The Senator from Illinois is altogether mistaken in saying that there is anything new in the matter, because the Auditor refers to the law, and the bill has been drawn up so as to make it come within the purviews of it.

Mr. SHIELDS. My only objection to the bill is on the ground which I have stated. It provides for giving a pension to the widow of an officer for life. Am I correct in that?

Mr. GWIN. No, sir, it provides for giving it to her until her marriage. It is in exact accordance with the act of 1848, giving pensions to the widows of other officers of the Navy of the United States.

Mr. SHIELDS. I hold that whether in the Army or Navy, the widows should be put on the same footing. If we pass a special bill, to give a widow a pension for life in this particular case, why not in every other case? I have thought of this thing for some time, and have expected that the Committee on Pensions would take into consideration the whole subject, and let us pass some general bill embracing all these cases. I have already stated that I think minors, in certain cases, should receive pensions, and so should the widows; but here is a case where the widow is to be pensioned for life; and, as I understand, the children, after her death, are to be pensioned until they arrive at the age of sixteen. If we establish this as a precedent, why not apply it to all cases? If it be just in one case, it is just in another; and all I ask is, that we should have some general principle, by which we might understand what we are doing. I would therefore suggest to the friends of the bill, either to let it lie over for the present, or, as the chairman of the Committee on Pensions states, that there is a general bill before the Senate, embracing the same principle.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. But not applying to this case.

Mr. SHIELDS. Why is it not made to apply to all such cases? I shall take occasion, then, to endeavor to amend the bill, and make it apply to all such cases; because, if we go into the general system, it should embrace the officers of the Army and of the Navy, and of the revenue service, and all. I move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. GWIN. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion, for he evidently does not understand the bill; and I want the Senate to understand it before acting on the motion.

Mr. SHIELDS. I withdraw it.

Mr. GWIN. The Senator mistakes the tenor of the bill. I have here the letter of the Commissioner of Pensions, in regard to the case on which this bill is founded, which I will read to the Senate:

PENSION OFFICE, June 21, 1852.

Sir: The petition of Mary Woodward, widow of the late Lieutenant Kirby J. Woodward, of the United States revenue service, referred by you to this office, for "any information or suggestions" which I may deem proper to communicate, and the papers accompanying the same, came daily to hand; in answer to which I have to state, that although her claim is not of a character, or supported by evidence such as to justify the Commissioner of Pensions in the allowance of a pension, yet it appears to be a meritorious case, and, as such, should, in my opinion, be allowed by Congress.

The only alteration that I would suggest, as proper to be made in the bill, (a copy of which I have before me,) is, that the compensation be at the rate of $30 per month, which is the pension now allowed by law to the widow of a lieutenant commanding in the United States Navy, and to be continued to her during her widowhood, and after her death, or intermarriage, to be paid to her children until they respectively arrive at sixteen years of age, agreeably to the provisions of the act of 11th of August, 1848.

The petition and papers forwarded by you to this office are herewith returned.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. E. HEATH, Commissioner of Pensions.
Hon. Geo. W. Jones,
Chairman Committee on Pensions, U. S. Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. This bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions. Is that committee aware that the revenue service does not belong to the military department?

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. It belongs to the civil department of the Government. It will be the introduction very clearly of a new principle to undertake to pension the civil department of the Government. I think that should be pretty well considered before we adopt the principle.

Mr. HALE. There has been—either last Congress or this, I am not certain which—a departure, and but a single departure from the exception suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts; and if this case comes up to that, I am willing to go for it. That was this: where an officer of the revenue service, during the late war with Mexico, was ordered into the naval service, and lost his life while doing duty under the orders of naval officers, and constituting a part of the war arm of the service. In that case, we gave a pension; and I think it was to the widow of a Massachusetts officer, a Mrs. Wright. But further than that, Congress has never gone. There was a case presented a Congress or two since by a Senator from Maine, when I had the honor of being upon the Committee on Pensions, and it was a very severe case, of a man who was very badly mangled while in the civil service of the United States blasting rocks, I think, for a fortification. Congress there refused a pension. And they refused to pension the widow Wright, until new proof was adduced by which it appeared that that portion of the revenue service in which he was engaged, was actually ordered into the naval service of the United States. When they learned that, and not till then, they gave a pension, the part of the revenue service to which he was attached being actually, and in fact, at the time, a part of the naval service. If this case comes within that exception, I will be willing to go for the bill. If it does not, I think it will be establishing a dangerous precedent.

Mr. GWIN. In answer to that statement—the report of the committee not having been printed—I will state the circumstances under which this gentleman lost his life. He was on a surveying expedition—the coast survey had not then extended to that portion of California; he was engaged in surveying the Trinidad Bay, in order to prevent smuggling. He was performing a service which should have been performed by the officers of the Navy, if provision had been made for their performing it. The collector of the port of San Francisco ordered a revenue cutter to Trinidad Bay, to ascertain if smuggling vessels could enter, or were entering there; and while engaged in that service Lieutenant Woodward was drowned.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. They knew there was smuggling going on there.

Mr. GWIN. Yes, they knew it, and the cutter was sent for the purpose of preventing it, and while in the performance of the service the officer was drowned. A more meritorious case was never presented to Congress.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not think the statement of the Senator from California varies the question. This is strictly the civil service, and the question arises whether you should pension men who meet with misfortune in the civil service of the country. There is now pending here, I believe, in the form of a bill, the question whether you shall pension a pilot who piloted one of the ships-of-war, and received some injury when doing it. How does it differ from the injury received in the erection of the extension of this Capitol? The officer for the pension of whose widow this bill provides was in the revenue service, clearly; nothing else. They were surveying for revenue purposes, and do you mean to adopt the principle that if any man receives an injury in the coast survey he is to be pensioned? I am disposed to be as liberal as any man in granting pensions, but I like to see the limits to it. It seems to me the passage of the bill will be adopting a principle that ought to be well considered before we agree to it.

Mr. GWIN. We have already adopted the principle of pensioning the widows of persons lost in the coast survey. For instance, the case of the loss of the Washington, a bill for which has already passed the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. They were naval officers.

Mr. GWIN. They were naval officers in the coast survey. Suppose that the coast survey had been engaged in exploring the Trinidad Bay, and one of its officers had been lost, as Lieutenant Woodward was, would he not have been pensioned? That is the question. This service not having been performed by the coast survey, and it being indispensable to preserve the revenue that it should be performed, and this officer having been ordered to perform it, and while performing it having lost his life, it seems to me there can be no doubt about the merit of the claim.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am opposed to this bill, because it does introduce, as I conceive, a new principle, and it will be made the precedent for a general bill or a great deal of special individual legislation in other cases like this. We have had the question in various shapes before us in reference to granting pensions and making provisions for those injured in the civil service and employment of the Government of the United States, and have always refused to do it. I rise for the purpose of illustrating, by giving one or two cases which have come under my observation during my service in Congress. We had a case from North Carolina of an individual employed in manufacturing cartridges, or something like that, for the Government of the United States, in reference to the military arm of the service. He was blown all to pieces; but not belonging to the Army, not being attached to it as a soldier, no compensation could be allowed, and he was put upon the footing of other laborers. We have had several cases where individuals have fallen in the erection of public buildings in this city. They were mechanics in the service and employment of the Government. They had their limbs broken; some, perhaps, were disabled for life. They wanted to get on the pension list; but Congress heretofore has always refused to make any provision for them. They were put upon the footing of employees of individuals in building and erecting houses. We have a building north and south of us upon which hundreds of laborers are now employed, and, in all probability, before it is finished there may be a number of accidents, some of which may deprive persons of life, and maim others for life. In this particular case, an officer of the revenue service lost his life. Is he more meritorious than those who may, in the progress of this building, lose their lives or have their limbs fractured? I am one of those who think that the pension system in all conscience has been carried far enough already. I have looked at it, and opposed the extension of it, but have met with so little support that I became almost too discouraged to open my mouth against any proposition made to pension any individual; but we have gone so far already that it seems to me to indicate the spirit of putting one half of the community upon the shoulders of the other half to be supported. I hope it will not be extended.

Mr. SMITH. The lady, for whom the bill provides, who had the misfortune to lose her husband, is a constituent of mine. I take some interest in the subject, and am desirous of looking into it. It has been in the hands of the committee which has made a favorable report, and I did not suppose that it would encounter any serious opposition here. I wish, however, to suggest whether we had not better lay it aside for the present. I move to lay it on the table for the present, and will aid to call it up again whenever it is desired.

The motion was agreed to.

CATLIN'S GALLERY.

Mr. SEWARD, from the select committee, to which was referred a resolution of the Senate, directing them to inquire into the expediency of purchasing Mr. Catlin's collection of Indian Scenes, submitted a report, in which the committee represent that Mr. Catlin is an American citizen, who was born and educated in the State of Pennsylvania. Gifted with genius for the arts, and imbued with a spirit of enthusiastic devotion to the fame of his country, in early life, without either public or private patronage, he repaired to the haunts of the savages in the recesses of the continent, and winning their kindness and confidence, while as yet the white man was almost unknown to them, he visited, in the period of eight years, forty-eight tribes, and in the end, brought away this very large collection of paintings, which exhibits with great felicity, complete views of the most interesting forest and prairie scenes of the continent, with portraits of the various characters found there, and ample illustrations of the political, social, and religious customs, ceremonies, and costumes of the race; a collection which gratifies an enlightened curiosity now, and will, with the progress of time, acquire inestimable value as an aid to the philosopher and the historian in the study of human nature in a peculiar stage of development, never before sufficiently marked. Having completed his collection, Mr. Catlin, in 1837, exhibited it in this city, and in pursuance of his original purpose, offered it to the Government, and it reported favorably on that proposition; but delays occurred, and Mr. Catlin, without abandoning his wish for such an eventual disposition, took them to Europe, as well to support himself by exhibiting it, as to use it in preparing a great work, since completed, on the history, customs, and manners of the North American Indians. The collection excited much interest and admiration in Europe, and obtained for Mr. Catlin many marks of respect and consideration from the friends of science and the arts in foreign courts. While at Paris the American artists, then residing there, and among whom were several whose fame has become a part of our national glory, addressed a memorial to Congress, praying them to adopt measures to restore the collection to our country, and to place it among her records. In support of this proposition, they remarked that the collection was not only interesting to our countrymen, generally, but absolutely necessary to American artists; that the Italian who wished to portray the history of Rome, found reminiscences of her sons in the Vatican; that the French artist could study the Gauls in the Museum of the Louvre; and that the Tower of London was rich in the armor and weapons of the Saxon race; and that, without such a collection, few of the glories of the pages of our early history could be illustrated. The same view of the subject was taken by the Joint Committee on the Library of Congress, to whom that interesting memorial was referred. More recently a communication has been submitted to Congress, by several eminent members of the Historical Society of New York, recommending the purchase of the collection on substantially the same grounds. The select committee concur in these opinions, and they add that, admitting the merit of the collection, which is conclusively established by documents now before the Senate, and admitting also the ability of the Government to secure it, which cannot reasonably be denied, no argument can be brought against the purchase of it on just and reasonable terms, which would not equally weigh against every appropriation by Congress for the acquisition and preservation of the materials of science and of history; against the deposit of contemporaneous works in the Library of Congress; the illustration of grand and interesting events in the national progress on canvas and in marble, which grace the chambers, walls, and gardens of the Capitol; and, indeed, against all the treasures of science and art already gathered into the archives of the country. Copiousness is essential to the value of the instructions of history, and if we should attempt a discrimination between the various materials gathered for such a use, surely the last this great and generous people should exclude would be those that supply us scanty information concerning the great and heroic yet simple race whom, with a strong arm and little tenderness, we are expelling, and perhaps unavoidably exterminating, throughout the broad domain of which they once were undisturbed and unquestioned occupants.

To reject the cultivation and perfection of the arts altogether, would be to concede that in all that makes us differ from the savage tribes, we are neither better nor wiser than they. In all countries, and especially in a Republic, the great responsibilities of those who are charged with the conduct of the affairs of society, as the education of the people in valor, wisdom, and virtue, there is no point at which such education can be wisely arrested; since the more complete and universal education becomes, the more fully the Democratic principle is developed, and the more safely and easily is free government sustained. While the responsibilities of education, in a strict sense, rest upon the several States, the right and duty of the United States to promote that great object incidentally, in the administration of the national domain, and in its exclusive legislation in the District of Columbia, have been fully acknowledged and practically exercised and performed since the foundation of the Government. The committee invoke the performance of a similar duty now. Why should not the capital of the United States take on the classic dignity and the refinement worthy of the seat of Government of a great people? How shall we better strengthen the bonds of our Union than by rendering the capital an object of pride and interest to the people of every State? How shall we impress mankind with the excellence of the republican system more easily and more effectually than by exhibiting to them the archives of art and science in the classic seat of republican authority?

The committee submit with this report a letter recently received from Mr. Catlin, which brings the painful intelligence that he is sunk under the pressure of debts, and is now imprisoned, while his collection is advertised to be sold on execution in London. Under these circumstances he reduces his price to the Government from $65,000, its former estimated worth, to $25,000. While these unhappy circumstances furnish no sufficient ground for interposition by the Government for his relief, they may, nevertheless, be allowed to stimulate us to the action recommended, if, as has been argued, it is wise and proper in itself. It is obvious that without a careful inspection of the collection, so as to ascertain its present condition and value, it would be unwise to name a definite price; the committee therefore recommend that the subject be intrusted to an agent, to be appointed by the President, with a limited discretion. The committee submit a joint resolution in conformity with this report.

It proposes to authorize the President of the United States to purchase the collection of Indian Scenes and Portraits of George Catlin, for the use of the United States, on such terms, not exceeding $30,000 for the cost, as he shall think proper; to cause them to be deposited in such of the public edifices of the Government, in the city of Washington, as he shall think proper; and to appoint for this purpose an agent, to act under his instructions, who shall receive a compensation not exceeding his traveling expenses and eight dollars a day for sixty days, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The resolution was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

RECOMMITTAL OF A BILL.

Mr. HALE. I submitted, a few days since, a motion to reconsider a vote on a bill that had been passed by the Senate, and sent to the House of Representatives. That motion was agreed to, and the bill was returned from the House of Representatives. It is a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the progress of the useful arts, and to repeal all acts and parts of acts heretofore made for that purpose," approved July 4th, 1836; and also "An act to provide additional examiners in the Patent Office, and for other purposes," approved May 27, 1848. Since that time I have understood that very great interests are involved in the passage of that bill, vastly more, in fact, than the Senate was aware of when it was passed. I now desire, and such I understand is the wish of those interested, that it should be again referred to the Committee on Patents. It is, in fact, a bill which affects interests, now in litigation, to the amount of $1,000,000. I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

CLERKS OF COURTS.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of excluding, by law, clerks of the courts of the United States from practicing as attorneys or counsellors in any court of the United States.

BILL PASSED.

The engrossed bill authorizing imported goods, wares, and merchandise, entered and bonded for warehousing, in pursuance of law, to be exported by certain routes to ports and places in Mexico, was read a third time and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives was received, by Mr. FORNEY, its Clerk, announcing that it had returned to the Senate, in accordance with its request, the bill for the punishment of crimes in the District of Columbia; and that it had passed the following bills:

An act to amend an act entitled "An act to create the office of surveyor general of the public lands in Oregon, and to provide for the survey, and to make donations to the settlers, of the said 'public lands,'" approved September 27, 1850;

An act to appropriate lands for the support of schools in certain townships and fractional townships in the Territory of Minnesota, not before provided for;

An act to amend an act entitled "An act to settle and adjust the expenses of the people of Oregon, in defending themselves from attacks and hostilities of the Cayuse Indians, in the years 1847 and 1848," approved February 14, 1851;

The above-named bills were severally read a first and second time by their titles, and referred—the first two to the Committee on Public Lands; the four following to the Committee on Territories; the seventh to the Committee on Military Affairs; and the last named to the Committee on Commerce.

PORTRAIT OF MR. CLAY.

The message from the House of Representatives also announced that it had passed the following joint resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, That the portrait of Henry Clay, presented to the nation by Guiseppe Fagnazi, a resident of New York, be placed in the Library of Congress.

The resolution was read a first and second time by its title, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. No amendment being offered, it was read a third time and passed.

CRIME IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The PRESIDENT. The bill to amend an act entitled "An act for the punishment of crime in the District of Columbia," which was sent to the House of Representatives by mistake, has been returned in consequence of a message sent to the House asking its return to the Senate. Amendments were made to the bill by the Senate, and they were ordered to be engrossed. They have been engrossed; and the bill will now have its third reading, if such is the pleasure of the Senate.

Mr. BRADBURY. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to offer a further amendment, for the purpose of removing all doubt as to the meaning of the amendment already adopted. It is to insert the words "whether the same shall be completed, or in process of erection."

The PRESIDENT. That amendment can only be made by unanimous consent.

Mr. BRADBURY. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to have the amendment made. It is to supply an accidental omission.

There being no objection, the amendment was agreed to. The bill was then read the third time and passed.

The effect of the amendment is to impose the penalties of the bill for the burning of buildings, "whether the same shall be completed, or in process of erection."

MINT IN CALIFORNIA.

The PRESIDENT. The bill of the Senate to establish a branch Mint of the United States at San Francisco, in California, has been returned from the House of Representatives with various amendments, which will now be considered, if such is the pleasure of the Senate.

Mr. GWIN. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will concur in all of these amendments. They are all restrictions upon the bill as they originally passed the Senate without opposition. Most of the amendments are reductions of salaries; and one of them is a restriction upon the Secretary of the Treasury, that he shall expend only a certain sum of money in the purchase of machinery to put the Mint in operation. I am not in favor of the restriction, because it may be necessary to expend more; but in order to have the bill become a law immediately, I hope the Senate will concur in all the amendments. I move that the Senate concur in them.

Mr. BADGER. I hope that course will be pursued. I suppose every gentleman understands the force of these amendments. Any one who was in favor of the bill as it originally passed the Senate, certainly cannot be opposed to the amendments.

Mr. HALE. I shall not interpose any objection to these amendments, but I am exceedingly opposed to the principle of passing bills in this way, without an examination by a committee. It is impossible that the Senate can understand these amendments. I do not understand them. I am not opposed to the bill; but I wish to state that we passed one bill the other day, which we have had to recall; and I think it is a dangerous precedent to pass bills in this way, and I do not desire to see it established. There are a great number of amendments to this bill. I do not understand them—I do not know what they are. I am not opposed to the bill; but I am opposed to this way of passing bills. I hope it will be referred.

Mr. GWIN. If the Senator will listen to me for a moment, I think he will withdraw his objection. Most of the amendments of the House simply reduce the salaries of officers. We passed the bill originally, without objection, providing certain salaries; the amendments of the House reduce those salaries and impose a limitation on the Secretary of the Treasury as to the amount he shall spend in putting the Mint into operation. Every amendment of the House is a limitation on what has already been passed by the Senate; and I do not think there should be any delay in acting upon these amendments. The chairman of the Committee on Finance is not here; and if we refer the bill to his committee, it may create a delay of perhaps a week. It is important that the bill should be passed now, and I hope the amendments will be concurred in at once.

The question being taken, the amendments were concurred in.

SISTERS OF VISITATION.

On the motion of Mr. SHIELDS, the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to the consideration of the bill to incorporate the Sisters of Visitation, of Washington, in the District of Columbia.

The bill, as originally introduced by Mr. SEWARD, provided that the present Sisters of Visitation and their female associates and successors, who now are or hereafter may become Sisters or Lay Sisters of the Visitation according to the regulations and by-laws that have been or may be adopted and established by their association, be made, declared, and constituted a corporation or body-politic in law and in fact, to have continuance forever, by the name, style, and title of the "Sisters of the Visitation of Washington;" and that the corporation may receive, hold, purchase, take, and apply to the uses and purposes of the association, any lands, tenements, rents, legacies, rights, property, and privileges, and all goods, chattels, and effects, of any kind or nature, which may be given, granted, sold, bequeathed, or devised unto them. It goes on to make other provisions for managing the affairs of the corporation.

The Committee on the District of Columbia reported an amendment to the bill, which is to strike out all of the bill after the names of the present Sisters of Visitation, and to insert the following:

"With such female associates as now are or may hereafter become Sisters or Lay Sisters of the Visitation, according to the rules and by-laws thereof, which have been or may be hereafter established, and their successors, be and they are hereby made a body-politic and corporate forever, by the name of 'The Sisters of the Visitation of Washington,' for purposes of charity and education; and by that name may sue and be sued, prosecute and defend; may have and use a common seal, and the same alter and renew at pleasure; may adopt and establish rules, regulations, and by-laws, not repugnant to the laws of the United States, for properly conducting the affairs of the corporation; may take, receive, purchase, and hold estates, real, personal, and mixed, not exceeding in value $200,000 at any one time, and manage and dispose of the same at pleasure, and apply the same, or the proceeds of the sales thereof, to the uses and purposes of the association, according to the rules and regulations which now are or which may hereafter be established."

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That Congress may at any time amend or repeal this act."

Mr. BAYARD. I move to strike out, in the amendment of the committee, the word "two," and insert "one," so as to reduce the amount of property to be held by the corporation to $100,000. It seems to me, that property to the amount of $100,000, is enough for any charitable corporation to hold in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SHIELDS. I would have no objection to that; but I understand that the property at present amounts to a little more than $100,000. That is the reason why $200,000 was inserted in the amendment, in order to cover the buildings and property at present held. I hope the gentleman will not insist on the amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. I have no objection to the bill, but I am very much opposed to the erection of corporations, for charitable or any other purposes, with such a large amount of capital.

Mr. SHIELDS. I would suggest $150,000. That would embrace the property now held.

Mr. WELLER. The terms of the proposed charter are so general that I should not be surprised if they should go to banking under it.

Mr. SHIELDS. I would not have the slightest objection to the amendment, but for the fact that $100,000, as I am informed, will not cover the proposed value of the property.

Mr. BAYARD. Then I move to strike out

"$200,000," and insert "$150,000," so as to limit the amount of property to be held to $150,000.

Mr. SHIELDS. I am willing to agree to that. Mr. WELLER. That will be enough, unless they intend to go to banking.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to, and the amendment as amended was agreed to. The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; the amendment was concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On the motion of Mr. ATCHISON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened,

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 23, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the pending amendment to House bill No. 280—a bill making grants of land to aid in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes.

POST ROUTE BILL.

Mr. OLDS. I desire to give notice to the House, that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads are engaged in the preparation of their post route bill. It is desirable that members having memorials and petitions upon that subject should see they are attended to before the bill is reported, so that no amendments may be offered afterwards.

GRANTS OF LANDS TO THE STATES FOR RAILROADS.

The SPEAKER. The pending amendment to House bill No. 280, offered as a substitute for the third section, will be read.

It was read by the Clerk, as follows:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That of the lands hereby granted to the eleven first-named States, a portion of the proceeds thereof shall be applied to the said States respectively, in the manner directed in the preceding section to aid in the construction of the following lines or routes of railroads, namely: From Toledo, Ohio, via Logansport, Lafayette, and Peoria, to Burlington; from Cincinnati, Ohio, via Vincennes, to St. Louis, with a branch from a point in Illinois, via Mount Carmel, to New Albany; from such point on the Mississippi river, within the limits of Arkansas, as that State shall appoint, via Little Rock, to Fort Smith, Arkansas, with a branch from Little Rock to Fulton, on the Red river, and a branch from Little Rock to Cairo, at the mouth of the Ohio river; from Terre Haute, in Indiana, via Springfield, to Bloomington, in Illinois; from New Orleans, by the way of Jackson and Canton, in Mississippi, thence to connect by the nearest and best route with the proposed Nashville and New Orleans railroad, and from Canton, by the way of Holly Springs, to the line of the State of Tennessee; from Girard, in Alabama, to the waters of the Mobile bay; from Brandon, in Mississippi, to Montgomery, in Alabama; from Pensacola bay, in Florida, to Montgomery, in Alabama; from the river or Lake Saint Clair, or the waters flowing into the same, to Lake Michigan; from the southern boundary of Wisconsin, through Janesville and Fond du Lac, to Lake Superior; from Selma, in Alabama, to Gunter's Landing, on the Tennessee river; from the Atlantic Ocean, in Florida, to the Gulf of Mexico, in said State; from Davenport and Burlington, in Iowa, to the Missouri river, and from Dubuque to the Sioux river, and to Keokuck, in said State; from Manitowoc, in Wisconsin, to the Mississippi river; from San Francisco to San José; from the Saginaw river to Mackinaw, in the State of Michigan; from Mobile bay, in Florida, and to the Chattahoochee river and Flint river, in Georgia; from a point opposite New Orleans to the Sabine river, in Louisiana; from Shreveport to the Mississippi river. Said railroads to be constructed on the most direct and feasible routes between the points before mentioned, and the proceeds of the residue of the land herein granted to the said eleven first-named States respectively, to be applied by them to aid in the construction of such other railroads as the Legislatures of said States may respectively designate: Provided, No more land shall be taken by any State under this act in the whole, than is granted to said State by the first section thereof.

The question was then taken upon the amendment, and it was rejected—yeas 73, nays 95; as follows:

Previous to the announcement of the preceding vote,

Mr. GROW said: I have paired off with my colleague, [Mr. BIBIGHAUS.] He would have voted for the bill.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question recurred on ordering the bill to be engrossed, and read a third time.

Mr. STUART demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is a motion for a call of the House now in order?

The SPEAKER. The previous question still operating, it is not in order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move that the bill be laid upon the table.

Mr. BEALE. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken on the motion to lay the bill upon the table, and it was disagreed to—yeas 87, nays 96; as follows:

Previous to the announcement of the preceding vote,

Mr. FITCH rose and said: I rise to a question of order. If the vote be what I understand it will—that the order for the engrossment and third reading will be carried by one vote—I now give notice that I shall desire the Speaker to vote.

Mr. HOUSTON. That point should be raised after, and not previous, to the announcement of the vote by the Speaker.

Mr. BENNETT obtained the floor.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I suggest to the gentleman from New York, the morning hour having expired, to move to recommit this bill; so that it may be before the House for consideration to-morrow morning.

Mr. BENNETT. That is the intent with which I obtained the floor. I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. STUART. I rise to a question of order. I object to that motion as out of order. The morning hour has expired. I move that the House proceed to the consideration of the business upon the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves a recommitment of the bill; will the gentleman from Michigan state his point of order?

Mr. STUART. It is this: I rose, stated the morning hour had expired, and of course have the precedence to make the motion to go to the business upon the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The decision of the Chair, with regard to that point, is this: The gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNETT] rose and was recognized by the Chair; and until he stated what his purpose was, the gentleman from Michigan could not obtain the floor for any purpose. Both may have risen precisely with the same design. The Chair will state now, however, that the morning hour has expired.

Mr. STUART. I made that inquiry before the gentleman from New York was recognized.

[Cries all over the Hall of "No!" "No!"]

The SPEAKER. The fact that the morning hour has expired does not necessarily carry the House from the consideration of this business. A motion for that purpose must be submitted and agreed to first.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. It is, that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNETT] had no right to make the motion to recommit, for the reason that the previous question was not then exhausted. The question was upon the engrossment of the bill, and ordering it to be read a third time. That order has not yet been executed—the bill not having been read a third time—and, consequently, the previous question not having been exhausted, the motion to recommit could not be submitted.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill a third time. The Chair will state, in advance, that the gentleman from New York will be entitled to the floor by the practice and courtesy of the House, should he claim it.

Mr. JONES. Have I not the right, at this time, to move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union before that bill is read a third time?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour having expired, the gentleman might move to go to the business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. JONES. I wish that point understood—that I can take the floor from the gentleman occupying it after the morning hour has expired.

The SPEAKER. The rule reads: "After commitment and report thereof to the House, or at any time before its passage, a bill may be re-committed."

Mr. JONES. But then the previous question is still operating. The bill has not yet been read a third time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has directed the Clerk to read it.

Mr. JONES. And have I not the right to the floor between the vote being taken upon the engrossment?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York claims it.

Mr. JONES. I inquire whether I can move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union? I conceive that that motion is clearly in order; because the morning hour has expired. After the expiration of the morning hour, I can take the floor from the gentleman occupying it and addressing the House, and if I can get the floor at any time after it has expired, or even during the morning hour—

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will suspend, the Chair decides the House having ordered the bill to be read a third time, it must, in obedience to that order, be read a third time.

Mr. JONES. One solitary word. On yesterday the motion was made, and has been repeatedly submitted here after the main question had been ordered to be put, that the House go to the business upon the Speaker's table, or into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CARTTER. I object to this consumption of time.

Mr. ORR. I will make a suggestion. The Speaker decides, as I understand, that in pursuance to the order of the House, the bill must now be read before anything else can be done. I submit this question: Suppose that bill had not been engrossed, how would it be possible that the order could be executed? It is not to be presumed that the bill is engrossed.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman take an appeal?

Mr. JONES. I inquire whether the Chair decides—

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

Mr. JONES. I wish to inquire whether my point has been overruled?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has ordered the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. JONES. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move to lay that appeal upon the table.

Mr. ORR. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to lay the appeal upon the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MEADE. The question is now upon an appeal taken from the decision of the Chair?

The SPEAKER. It is; and the Chair will state the nature of the decision from which the appeal has been taken. The House, by vote, a few minutes since, ordered the bill to be engrossed and read a third time. The Chair decided, in obedience to that order, that the bill must be read a third time. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] raised the question of order, that he had the right, at that particular stage of the proceedings, to submit a motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The Chair overruled the question of order. The gentleman took an appeal. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] moved to lay that appeal upon the table, which motion is now pending.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask whether it be now in order to move that the House adjourn?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will decide that question when it arises.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the object of the gentleman. It is to embarrass the Chair.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am glad the Speaker does. It is legitimate.

The question was then taken on the motion to adjourn, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. MEADE. As the fate of this bill will probably depend on the vote upon the motion to lay the appeal from the decision of the Chair upon the table, I move a call of the House.

MR. STANTON, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. I believe the previous question is not yet exhausted.

The SPEAKER. It was exhausted upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

MR. STANTON. It will not be exhausted until that order is executed; and if so, the motion for a call of the House is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order raised by the gentleman. The motion is not in order, for the reason that the previous question will not be exhausted until the bill shall have been read a third time.

The question recurred on the motion to lay the appeal on the table.

MR. ORR demanded the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

MR. ORR. Is it in order to move to proceed to the consideration of the business on the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. Not until after this question is taken.

MR. BENNETT. Before the question is taken, I wish, as a matter of justice, that one fact should be set right. I rose, was recognized by the Chair, and submitted my motion to recommit before the gentleman made the motion to go to the business upon the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. That is so, and it is a point which ought to be considered in regard to this bill. The House should know that so soon as the vote was announced ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time, the gentleman from New York rose, was recognized by the Chair, and moved to recommit the bill.

MR. BURT. I desire to ask a question of the Chair as to a matter of fact, whether the bill was actually engrossed?

The SPEAKER. It is engrossed.

The question was then taken on laying the appeal upon the table; and there were—yeas 129, nays 50.

So the appeal was laid upon the table.

The bill was then read the third time.

MR. BENNETT. I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands; and upon that motion I call for the previous question.

MR. STUART. I move to proceed to the business on the Speaker's table.

MR. MOREHEAD. I hope the gentleman will suspend one moment for a privileged question.

MR. STUART. For a personal explanation?

MR. MOREHEAD. I wish to make a personal explanation, and I will detain the House but a moment. It is this: That when the motion was made to lay this bill upon the table, and the yeas and nays were called, I was under the impression that the question was upon reading the bill a third time, and I voted ay. I beg of the House the privilege of having the Journal corrected.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk informs the Chair that the gentleman voted in the negative.

MR. MOREHEAD. Some of my friends told me differently.

The question being upon Mr. STUART's motion to proceed to the business on the Speaker's table—

MR. BENNETT demanded a division.

The question was then taken, and there were—ayes 55, noes not counted.

MR. STUART demanded tellers; and they were ordered.

The question was then taken, Messrs. STUART and FOWLER acting as tellers, and there were—ayes 94, noes not counted.

So the House agreed to proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table.

MR. MEADE. If the motion has not been made—and I am not able to say whether it has, there has been so much confusion in the Hall—I ask if it is in order to move a reconsideration of the vote by which this bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time?

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

MR. MEADE. Then I make that motion.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia propose action at this moment?

MR. MEADE. I only ask that the motion be entered upon the Journal.

MR. STANTON, of Tennessee. How did the gentleman from Virginia vote?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman voted in the affirmative he has a right clearly to submit the motion to reconsider the motion. It can be entered upon the Journal, and considered during the morning hour to-morrow.

MR. STANTON. I rise to inquire if the gentleman voted in the affirmative?

MR. MEADE. I wish the Clerk would inform the House whether I voted in the affirmative or negative.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk informs me that the gentleman voted in the negative; and the motion of the gentleman from Virginia cannot, therefore, be entertained.

INDEMNITY TO SPANISH SUBJECTS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, which was read, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, for your consideration, a report from the Secretary of State, accompanied by a communication from his Excellency Señor Don A. Calderon de la Barca, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of her Catholic Majesty, claiming indemnity for those Spanish subjects in New Orleans who sustained injury from the unlawful violence of the mob in that city, consequent upon hearing the news of the execution of those persons who unlawfully invaded Cuba in August, 1851. My own views of the national liability upon this subject were expressed in the note of the Secretary of State to Mr. Calderon of the 13th November, 1851; and I do not understand that her Catholic Majesty's Minister controverts the correctness of the position there taken. He, however, insists that the 13th article of the treaty of 1795 promises indemnity for such injuries sustained within one year after the commencement of war between the two nations; and, although he admits this is not within the letter of the treaty, yet he conceives that, as between two friendly nations, it is within the spirit of it.

This view of the case is, at his request, submitted for your consideration. But whether you may deem it correct or not, there is, perhaps, one ground upon which this indemnity, which cannot be large in amount, may be granted without establishing a dangerous precedent, and the granting of which would commend itself to the generous feeling of the entire country, and that is this: The Queen of Spain, with a magnanimity worthy of all commendation, in a case where we had no legal right to solicit the favor, granted a free pardon to the persons who had so unjustifiably invaded her dominions and murdered her subjects in Cuba, in violation of her own laws, as well as those of the United States, and the public law of nations. Such an act of mercy, which restored many misguided and unfortunate youth of this country to their parents and friends, seems to me to merit some corresponding act of magnanimity and generosity on the part of the Government of this country; and I think that there can be none more appropriate than to grant an indemnity to those Spanish subjects who were resident among us, and who suffered by the violence of the mob, not on account of any fault which they themselves had committed, but because they were the subjects of the Queen of Spain. Such an act would tend to confirm that friendship which has so long existed between the two nations, and to perpetuate it as a blessing to both; and I therefore commend it to your favorable consideration.

MILARD FILLMORE.

WASHINGTON, June 14th, 1852.

On motion by Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, the communication was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MR. HOUSTON. I move that the rules of the House be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of taking up the bill to supply deficiencies. Several gentlemen desire to make speeches.

MR. FLORENCE. Is it in order to move to refer the French spoliation bill to the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

The SPEAKER. Such a motion is not in order, as the bill is not before the House.

The question was then taken upon Mr. Houston's motion, and it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SEYMOUR, of Connecticut, in the chair.)

MR. HOUSTON. I move to take up House bill No. 207—the deficiency bill—with the Senate amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The question before the committee is House bill No. 43, and without a motion to postpone it by unanimous consent, the gentleman's motion cannot be entertained.

MR. HOUSTON. I can move to take up either. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TOWNSEND] is entitled to the floor upon the other bill, and if he desires to change and speak upon this bill, there will be no objection.

MR. CLEVELAND. I object to any change. Let the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TOWNSEND] make his speech upon the bill before the committee when he obtained the floor.

MR. HOUSTON. It makes no difference upon which bill the gentleman from Ohio makes his speech. It is with his assent that I make this motion.

MR. CLEVELAND. I withdraw my objection.

The deficiency bill was then taken up for consideration.

MR. TOWNSHEND, after replying to a portion of Mr. STANTON's remarks, made some days since, relating to himself, proceeded to submit some remarks on the present condition of the Democratic party. He considered this party as a party of progress, as a party of the present and future rather than of the past. For this reason he had cooperated with it, and had labored for it with all the energy he possessed. But the Democratic party did not own him, and he was not bound to follow its dictates, right or wrong. When, however, he could employ this agent to promote the great ends of humanity and justice, then and then only would he act with it. The Democratic Convention of Baltimore, composed of chosen delegates from the whole country, was doubtless only authorized to select men to be their standard-bearers in the approaching contest. It was also authorized to proclaim to the world the sentiments of the Democratic party. But he did not understand it to be the right of that convention to publish, as the sentiments of the Democratic party, doctrines which were held only by a portion of that party. The convention indorsed the compromise measures of the last Congress—a series of measures concocted by Clay, sustained by Webster, and put through by the force of Fillmore's administration. Now, he protested against this stealing of Whig thunder—this stealing of Whig timber, with which to build a Democratic platform. He protested against the interpolation into the Democratic creed of any thing which could make the party the ally of slavery and oppression. The Whig party, if either, was the natural ally of slavery; the Democratic party had a much higher and nobler mission to perform. The resolution affirming the compromise measures was a fraud, and intended to humbug those who chose to be humbugged by it. [Mr. T.'s speech will be found in the Appendix.]

MR. GIDDINGS obtained the floor, and addressed the House an hour in opposition to the platforms adopted by the Baltimore nominating conventions, in regard to the slave question. He repudiated them, and declared his intention, on his return to his constituency, to advocate the same doctrines of human liberty which had occupied his mind for the last fifteen years. [His speech will be published hereafter.]

MR. HORSFORD next obtained the floor, but yielded to

MR. BELL, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman (Mr. SEYMOUR, of Connecticut,) reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the deficiency appropriation bill, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

MR. ROBBINS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and

The House adjourned till to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

PETITIONS, &c.

The following petitions were presented under the rule, and referred to appropriate committees:

By Mr. ROBBINS: The petition of Robert Bell, George W. Ashe, and 34 other residents of the county of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, asking Congress to so modify the act passed September 28, 1850, as to give to each person intended to be benefited thereby, one hundred and sixty acres of land.

By Mr. STANTON, of Ohio: The petition of John Hamilton, of Champaign county, Ohio, praying compensation for his time, whilst he was a prisoner with Indians, in the war of 1812.

By Mr. ROBIE: The petition of Holman Marsh and Moses Bennett, for a post route from Bath, Steuben county, New York, to Towlesville, in said county.

By Mr. SCUDDER: The petition of Zenas D. Bassett and others, of Massachusetts, for the removal of a sunken wreck from the north channel of the Vineyard Sound.

On motion by Mr. BOWNE, it was Ordered, That the papers of Hannah W. Beek be withdrawn from the files of the House and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, June 24, 1852.

Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

A message from the House of Representatives was received by Mr. FORNEY, its Clerk, announcing that it concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill to amend an act for the punishment of crime in the District of Columbia.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. BADGER presented the petition of R. D. Battle, administrator of the estate of Isaac L. Battle, praying that the estate may be released from further liability under a judgment; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. PRATT presented the petition of James H. Stimpson, son and executor of James Stimpson, praying extension of patents for improvement in forming and using iron plates or rails on railroad tracks in cities and elsewhere, and for a new mode of turning short curves upon railroads; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

REPORT FROM A STANDING COMMITTEE.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the petition of J. R. St. John, praying compensation for certain improvements made by him in marine steam machinery, submitted an adverse report.

BILL PASSED.

The engrossed bill to incorporate the Sisters of the Visitation of Washington, in the District of Columbia, was read a third time and passed.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

On motion by Mr. UNDERWOOD, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by him some time since:

Resolved, That the thirtieth rule of the Senate be amended, by adding thereto the following:

"On motion, any amendment offered to a bill or resolution may be laid on the table, without carrying the bill or resolution with it."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I beg leave to offer a very few remarks in explanation of this amendment which I propose to our rules. I have discovered, from many years' experience, that towards the close of a session, when the general appropriation bills come up for consideration, gentlemen will propose amendments. Those amendments will be discussed day after day, and week after week sometimes, and we cannot get clear of them, because, in attempting to get rid of the amendments, you have to get clear of the whole appropriation bill by laying it upon the table. In that way we consume time, which makes our appropriation bills interminable by discussion. We have no previous question. We cannot stop debate by the previous question. Gentlemen introduce almost everything in the way of legislation, into the appropriation bills, and under the existing rules, towards the close of a session, our debates become interminable upon amendments to appropriation bills, with which the Senate is entirely satisfied, and of which it wishes to get rid. My object, therefore, is, in such a case as that, to allow a motion to be made to lay the amendment upon the table, without taking the bill or original proposition with it. The Senate will perceive that it will always be within its discretion to refuse to lay upon the table the proposition submitted as an amendment, if it meets the favorable consideration of the body. This proposition is only to place these amendments within the power of a majority of the body, and allow us to get rid of a useless discussion, and to progress with the business.

I hope, sir, that this amendment will be adopted, and let us see how it will operate. I have seen this evil for years. I have thought that some remedy might be prescribed for it, and I think this will be a very efficient remedy. All that I ask is, that we may have an opportunity to try it, and if it does not work well, after experience, I shall be among the first to move its repeal. I think, however, that it will have a very beneficial operation.

Mr. BADGER. I would suggest to my friend from Kentucky that he should vary the phrase "may be laid on the table," to "may be ordered to lie on the table." I believe, "to lay on the table" is not a proper parliamentary motion, under our rules.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am willing to accept that modification.

Mr. BADGER. I would make another suggestion to my friend from Kentucky. If his rule is to have the effect of putting aside from the consideration of the body such propositions as the Senate may think improper to be considered in connection with others, it ought to extend to an amendment to an amendment; and I would suggest that he vary the phraseology in this way: "That 'an amendment to a bill or resolution, or to an amendment, may be ordered to lie on the table without carrying the main subject with it.'"

Mr. ADAMS. It seems to me that the suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina is unnecessary. An amendment to an amendment is but an amendment; and the original proposition of the Senator from Kentucky embraces all the purposes contemplated by the Senator from North Carolina. An amendment to an amendment is still but an amendment.

Mr. BADGER. My friend is mistaken. The resolution of the Senator from Kentucky is, that an amendment to a bill or resolution may be ordered to lie on the table. Now, an amendment to an amendment is not an amendment to a bill or resolution.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am altogether indifferent in regard to the phraseology of the resolution. The Senate perceive very clearly the idea which I have, and the object which I wish to attain. If my friend from North Carolina will be kind enough to draw up a resolution, modified as he wishes it, I will be glad to receive it.

Mr. BADGER. If the resolution will answer the purpose as it is, it is all I desire. I merely wish to have it effectual.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will accept any verbal modifications.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I do not feel any great interest in this matter. Personally I am rather disposed to favor the amendment; but I would suggest to the Senate, before adopting it, that it is a pretty wide departure from the system that has heretofore prevailed in the Senate. The debates in the Senate have heretofore been conducted upon the assumption that the Senate had discretion and judgment and wisdom enough to conduct its deliberations without so many restrictive rules as have been found necessary in the more popular branch of the National Legislature. This move of the Senator from Kentucky seems to be an indication that the Senate has found out that it has not quite so much of the self-governing principle—so much wisdom and so much discretion as theoretically it has been holding out to the country that it has. It seems to be an admission that we are approximating in our debates to that state of things which has characterized the other branch of Congress, and which has rendered necessary the many restrictive measures upon debate which they have adopted—such as the one-hour rule in a certain stage of debate, and the five-minutes rule in a certain other stage of debate, and an order for stopping debate altogether and coming to a vote upon the questions that are pending.

Now, sir, if the honorable Senator means this as the first indication to the country that we have discovered at last (what I think the country have begun to suspect long ago) that we are approximating to that state of things, I think the amendment is wise and timely. But it should be followed out. It should be followed next by the previous question, next by an order to stop debate, then by the one-hour rule, and the whole system of measures which the House of Representatives has found necessary for the purpose of restraining the "desire of much speaking," which has afflicted that body. I speak of this matter without much reference to myself; for I rarely speak in the Senate, and make very short speeches when I do, and do not expect to stay here a great while. But I think if we adopt this amendment of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, we ought not to stop there, but we ought to go further, and adopt the whole series of measures which I have pointed out. I make these suggestions, because I think that if we take this step, we ought to go further; and we shall go further, and we shall not retain either the character, or the pretense of the character, which it has been the pride of the Senate hitherto to sustain before the country.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I beg leave to quote a text for the edification of my friend from New Hampshire. I would say to him, "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." It is not worth while for us to go beyond the evil which I have pointed out, into other remedies for other evils which he has contemplated, until there is some necessity more manifest than any which I have heretofore seen, showing the propriety of their adoption. I would simply remark, that all deliberative bodies with which I am acquainted, except the Senate of the United States, have had the "previous question" as a part of their rules. We have never yet had the "previous question" as a part of the rules governing the Senate; and I think it probable that if this amendment to our rules be adopted, we may never have it introduced here as it has been in the other branch of Congress. Sir, this proposition is so simple and plain that I will not detain the Senate by making further remarks in regard to it. I hope the amendment to the rules which I have proposed may be adopted, and that we may see its practical results; and if it shall not work well, we can get clear of it.

Mr. ADAMS. It seems to me that the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky is palpably necessary and right, and that there can be no objection to it. The Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE,] while he throws out an objection to the amendment, through fear that this body will be assimilated to the other branch of Congress, himself says that the country has long since discovered the necessity for such a change of our rules. If the country has discovered it, I presume that the Senator himself, and every Senator on this floor, has discovered it; and who does not know that such a rule is necessary for the completion of the business of this body, both now and in future time? The proposition is, that when an amendment is offered to a bill, if a majority should order that amendment to lie on the table, that order shall not carry the bill along with it, and I do not see how such a proposition can be objected to. The effect of such a rule is simply to cut off irrelevant matter by allowing a majority to order it to lie on the table, that the Senate may be enabled to dispose of its business properly. To that I think there can be no objection, as it will only cut off debate to which a majority do not choose to listen. Sir, if it assimilates this body to the other branch of Congress in every sense of the word, if it is necessary that it should be done, I trust we shall not hesitate to do it. For myself, I should be perfectly willing to adopt all the measures of restriction which they have found necessary. But if this amendment should be adopted, it can only lead to the adoption of the rules which the House of Representatives have adopted, by a vote of a majority of the Senate. It seems to me that the amendment should be adopted without a dissenting voice; and I trust that the Senator from New Hampshire will vote for it, let the consequences be what they may, as on the merits of it he agrees that it is necessary.

Mr. BELL. I do not favor propositions for altering the rules adopted for the government of the Senate. I am reluctant that any alteration should be made now; but as it appears to be the sense of the Senate that some alteration should be made of the nature proposed by the Senator from Kentucky, and if that alteration is to be applied to the particular mischiefs pointed out by that Senator, I do not know that I would have much objection to it, if it can be limited to appropriation bills, to be settled and acted upon at the close of the session. I have felt, at the close of a session, the inconvenience of the existing rules, and I should be happy to concur with him if he would limit his proposition to the appropriation bills, because in such cases there seems to be a necessity that the Senate should come to a speedy decision on the main features of such bills. We all know that in regard to such bills we are frequently engaged during the very last hours of the session, and are sometimes even obliged to invade neutral or questionable ground as to time. Now, I have no objection to any amendment which shall have such limited application. As to the argument of honorable Senators in regard to the necessity of cutting off debate upon amendments offered to bills in the progress of the session, if the object is to cut off debate, let us at once establish the previous question in regard to amendments, and then you will simply reserve the right of taking the vote on the amendments themselves.

Any gentleman who has looked into the history of the British Parliament, and of American legislative bodies, whether in our State Assemblies or in Congress, and has noticed the rules adopted for their government, and the grounds on which those rules have been established and in use almost time out of mind, will find that this right of presenting amendments—or as I have sometimes heard it vulgarly expressed, this right of “poking” amendments at a bill—is the privilege and right of the minority. It is done for the purpose and with the view of checking an overwhelming majority in hurrying through measures which may be popular for a moment or a day, when the minority may see great danger or inconvenience, as likely to result from the adoption of the measures of the majority. The privilege of offering amendments in various forms and shapes, will be found to be for the protection of a minority against the will of an arbitrary majority. Sir, I can foresee ahead of us at this moment some bills on which the majority may be willing to evade a vote in regard to material amendments; and yet, sir, the privilege of presenting amendments to bills for the purpose of preventing great immediate or future mischiefs is the only safety which the minority may have. I do not say that there are any measures which I have in my mind’s eye to which such a course would be fatal; but there are measures in regard to which the adoption of such a rule might be highly mischievous. This privilege of introducing amendments, and bringing them to a vote with the view of checking up what might prove a great evil, even although proposed and supported by a majority, is one of the arms provided by ancient custom for the defense of a minority against the will of an arbitrary majority.

It is urged that our debates are likely to become interminable. If the object of the proposition is to limit debate, let us adopt a limited previous question, applicable to such amendments. That will not only exclude diffusiveness in discussion, but will leave the privilege open to a minority, of compelling a majority to regard what they consider salutary amendments to the main measure.

I need not say that the experience of all parliamentary bodies shows that, as majorities become large and self-confident, and presumptuous, the dangers to the rights of minorities are increased. If the main-spring of their actions shall be the public good, and all measures shall be brought forward with due consideration, there would seem to be no danger of mischief; but though gentlemen speak of our having arrived at a period of time when it is necessary to have these restrictive rules upon the privileges of majorities or individuals, either on offering amendments, or indulging in debate, I think the time has come when we require the fullest privilege, and that the danger is not that there will be too little legislation, but that we shall over-legislate, and become less and less cautious. We have had ideas put forth of late, proposing sweeping changes in the policy of the country, extending over the whole past economy of the Government and its legislation. I concur with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. ADAMS,] and the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] that there is some necessity for a limitation with regard to the appropriation bills; but even the appropriation bills will have to be acted upon within the last month of the session, and at no other time. But I consider the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky to be an infringement upon ancient parliamentary rules which have been conceived to be laid down in practical wisdom, and have been seen to work well, both in the British Parliament and in this country. If the proposition is limited, I have no objection; but as it is, it seems to be, as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] has suggested, the first step towards gagging the members of this Senate, and limiting the freedom of debate, so that minorities may be prevented from checking the arbitrary action of majorities. With the limitations I have suggested, I can vote for it, and not otherwise.

Mr. MANGUM. That something is necessary to be done to expedite the business of this body, I think must be sufficiently obvious to every gentleman who occupies a seat upon this floor. I have been very reluctant to join in making any fundamental change in the rules which we have laid down for our governance, for as they now are, I think in this respect we are perfectly safe. I am opposed to this proposition in its present form; and yet I would not be unwilling to make a temporary trial of the proposed change, if somewhat modified, although, in the main, I think it is yet too early in the session to propose to adopt it.

Sir, at the close of the last session, I was a witness to a scene which was enacted here, which was calculated to draw upon us the censure of almost the entire country. I refer to the speaking against time, with the view of defeating a vastly important measure—the river and harbor bill—and which succeeded in accomplishing that defeat. I then felt, for the first time in my life, the necessity of applying those restraints in this body which have been found to work well in practical legislation. I think that something like this proposition, as a temporary alteration—for I am unwilling to adopt it as a fundamental rule—might be safely applied to the appropriation bills, and to other matters towards the end of the session. Sir, this “cacothès loquendi,” as my friend from New Hampshire calls it—

Mr. HALE. I did not call it so; no, no. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANGUM. Well, then, this “desire for much speaking” has become almost a complete nuisance in this body. Mr. President, from the time when you first took your seat in this body to the present day, there is as much difference in the course of procedure in regard to such matters as there is between the mid-day sun and the moon shining through a hazy atmosphere—all the difference in the world. We must, therefore, resort to some mode of arresting this eternal talking. I know of one way which might possibly be applicable, although not very parliamentary. If we were to devolve upon the Chair the duty of sending for a surgeon to have our tongues slit, it might answer some good purpose in this respect; but, sir, I am afraid, that even in that case, decimation would not be sufficient, but am inclined to think the operation would have to be performed in cases—nine out of ten. [Laughter.]

If, however, we are to have any change in the rules in regard to this matter, I prefer that that change should be temporary; because, however unimportant it may seem at the first glance to make any essential and radical change in the rules which have been recognized for many years, and which have been found to work well, perhaps there is nothing with which we can tamper with less safety. I am unwilling to make an essential permanent inroad upon them, or upon other things which have worked well, not only in this country, but in other countries—rules which have worked well for centuries, which have been esteemed as being consonant with wisdom;—I say I am unwilling that these should be made to give place to that which is new and untried. If this proposition for a modification of the rules can be laid upon the table until business becomes more pressing, or till the appropriation bills come up, I shall be happy to unite in its temporary adoption near the close of the session. If it is found to work inconveniently, we can any day, upon giving a day’s notice, rescind it, for I suppose we shall be as much at liberty to rescind it as to pass it.

Sir, it has been observed by every gentleman here, that when we begin a debate upon any subject, too much time is spent upon the elementary portion of it, just as children are apt to do when learning to spell, going over everything twice over, as in a-p a-p, p-l e ple, apple, p-i-e pie, apple-pie. [Laughter.] That, sir, might as well be cut off. In the older and better times of the Senate, it was supposed that the representatives of sovereign States, from a proper sense of what was due to themselves, as well as what was due to this body, which was an august body, would restrain themselves from the excessive use of irrelevant talking. Modern experience, however, has shown that this feeling, as a restraint, is utterly insufficient for the purpose of correcting this abuse.

Mr. BADGER. I hope the proposition of my friend, the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] will receive the favorable consideration of the Senate. I have listened attentively to the gentlemen who have taken objection to it, and I am at a loss to say what principle of parliamentary proceeding will be violated by the rule that is proposed to be added to the rules of the Senate. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] says it is an advance, so far, towards the adoption of the “previous question.” Not at all. It is the exact opposite of that principle; and exactly contrary, in its application, to the “previous question.” The “previous question” authorizes a decision on a matter, while it cuts off debate on that matter.

The resolution of my friend from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] does not propose to invade the principle adopted by the Senate. That is: whatever has been considered and decided by the Senate, shall be considered open to debate. Not at all; but it simply authorizes the Senate, when it shall deem proper to do so, to say that a proposition which an individual Senator may think proper for consideration and discussion, shall be put aside as unfit for consideration. Now, that being the state of the case, I would ask if that is not a power which has ever been exercised by this body, and by every other legislative body on the face of the earth? Suppose that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has a bill here which he looks upon as highly important, and which he is desirous of discussing; and suppose that a majority of the Senate think it should not occupy the time of the Senate; suppose that a majority of the Senate are of opinion that it should not be discussed and decided, is it not in the power of any gentleman to move that the bill do lie on the table, and does not that motion cut off all debate? And if the majority of the Senate concur in the motion, is not the bill put aside, even under our existing rules, because the majority think that the bill is not proper to be considered and discussed? The only object of this amendment is to give to the Senate the same control over collateral questions, in respect to which they may entertain an opinion of the inexpediency of occupying time in their consideration, that, under the known and established rules of the Senate, it has always exercised over the main question. That is the real question.

Now, let us ascertain what is the enormity which some gentlemen seem to suppose will attend the adoption of this rule. I have supposed the case that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has a bill before the Senate, which he conceives to be important, and which he is desirous of having discussed, and I have supposed that a majority of the Senate are of opinion that it should not be discussed, and order it to lie on the table; well, on the next day there is another bill under consideration, and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] can now bring up, and offer as an amendment to it the very bill which was laid on the table by the order of the Senate! Will any Senator give me a reason why my friend should, on the second occasion, compel the Senate to hear the discussion of a measure which, according to the established usages of this body, lawfully exercised, the Senate has already ordered should neither be decided nor discussed? That is the whole question.

Mr. BELL. Will the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BADGER] allow me to interpose an observation? I am not desirous of speaking again on this subject.

Mr. BADGER. Certainly.

Mr. BELL. I beg leave to suggest to my friend that there is nothing at all in that argument, because the bill which he supposes to be laid on the table is a distinct measure, or one that is not fit to be discussed in the Senate, and it would not be in order to offer it to any other bill, unless it might come up in the shape of an appropriate amendment. There are other rules of the Senate, which you know would cure the mischiefs which the honorable Senator supposes would arise from that state of the case.

Mr. BADGER. Will the Senator mention what rule?

Mr. BELL. The amendment must be congruous—it must be appropriate to the bill.

Mr. BADGER. Not at all.

Mr. BELL. We cannot take a vote upon that; but I think I am right in what I say.

Mr. BADGER. No doubt my friend thinks he is right; but the difficulty is that he comes from the House of Representatives, of which he was once the distinguished and able Speaker; and I have never known a gentleman come from that House who did not bring more or less with him, the rules of it. There is no rule in the Senate which requires that an amendment moved shall be congruous or cognate to the main subject before the Senate. It is so in the House of Representatives, but it is because they have a special rule to that effect. If my friend will look at the statement in Jefferson’s Manual on that subject as to the relevancy of it, he will find, as to parliamentary law, that the Presiding Officer cannot rule an amendment out of order, because it is irrelevant. It is for the body to decide upon it. We have had the question raised and decided again and again, and I believe nothing is clearer; so that my friend is entirely mistaken in supposing that my case is not a case precisely in point. But it would not vary the argument, if it were not so. I have only to suppose that the bill which my friend intended to offer, (and which, if he offered alone, would be laid on the table,) he proposes as an amendment to another bill; and I say, that no man can point out any reason why the Senate shall in one case have the power of saying that the proposition before them is mischievous or unnecessary for the public business, and shall not be considered and discussed, and not have that power in the other case. Besides, Mr. President, my friend from Tennessee (I dare say, if I was as old as he is, I would have the same sort of feeling) looks back over the water, and cries out against putting on a gag, and stopping debate. Sir, I have been a member of this body six years, and have been in a minority all the time. I have heard gentlemen in charge of measures from the majority, over and over again, announce that they were going to have a vote upon them, and pass them—pass them in three days, or a week, or ten days; but I have never known a measure pass in this Senate while any gentleman wished to discuss it. With a decided party majority—with a decided party measure before the body, I have always found that a majority of the Senate could never be found to refuse to vote for an adjournment, for the purpose of allowing a gentleman to discuss the question. So far as my observation extends, the action of the Senate is decidedly the other way.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Their courtesy allows the debate to go on.

Mr. BADGER. Yes, their courtesy allows too large a debate, rather than cuts off what is unnecessary; but at all events, as my friend from Kentucky says, we have all felt the necessity for this amendment to our rules. Let us agree to it. It is not like a law of the Medes and Persians—unchangeable. If it operates injuriously, it is easy to strike it out again. The present system needs some amendment. This seems to be necessary and proper. It holds out a prospect of good, and I see no evil to result from it.

Mr. BELL. I would inquire of some other gentleman whether it be true that the parliamentary rules for the regulation of the Chair, not expressly incorporated in our rules, are to no extent binding upon the Presiding Officer of the Senate, except they be incorporated in the number of printed rules regularly established?

Mr. BADGER. If my friend will allow me, no one has said that. There is no general parliamentary law which makes the question of relevancy a point of order.

Mr. BELL. I would inquire again, is it possible that upon a bill, for example, regulating duties upon imports, it would be competent here to entertain a proposition to make an appropriation for the improvement of rivers and harbors?

Mr. BADGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BELL. Would there be no inconsistency—no impropriety in that? Is there no parliamentary law forbidding a gentleman rising up and offering to hook a speech upon a proposition for the improvement of rivers and harbors, to a bill regulating duties upon imports? There is no rule in the special rules of this body to prohibit it, and it may be that the Presiding Officer would have to refer it to the Senate to decide that question; but would it not be the duty of every Senator on this floor, according to the usual parliamentary law, to vote down such an idea—to rule it out as inconsistent, improper, incongruous, unparliamentary, and one which would render all attempts to legislate in this body utterly abortive? Certainly it would. If a Senator is at liberty to bring up his subject; such, for instance, as the honorable Senator from Kentucky, to bring up his bill for the improvement of the Cumberland dam, as an amendment to an entirely different bill, and raise a discussion upon it, it would be the duty of the body to object to it, or no legislation could be carried on.

The honorable Senator supposes that I have come here imbued with the rules applicable to the House of Representatives, and has been pleased to say that he never saw a gentleman from that House who did not come here so infected with the rules impressed upon him as a member of that body, and that he misapplies his advice to this body, when he comes from the House with his experience derived there, to apply those rules here. I beg leave to say upon this subject, that I have been very cautious and modest. I was not long the Presiding Officer of the House of Representatives, but I was long a member of it, and it became my business to look into and examine the wisdom of the old established parliamentary rules and proceedings, to see how important it was to preserve them, in order to preserve the privileges of debate. The Senator said I look too much over the water to get examples in a monarchy, in the British House of Parliament. Why, sir, a majority in this country may come—and such is the tendency of popular institutions and of popular assemblies—to possess a greater degree of tyranny, or as great a degree of tyranny, limited only by the Constitution, as can be in any parliament under a constitutional monarchical form of government, and more so, because they are presumed to be backed by what is called the sovereignty of the country. They represent the people; and I have heard the argument often alleged, that the will of the majority for the time being ought not to be checked; and have also heard the argument used, that all restrictions imposed are opposed to every popular idea of government and ought to be abrogated; and we see in many States the restrictions are being broken down.

I look to the British Parliament for the reason, not so much for the practice, as for the reason given by what they call the sages of the great Commons, as vindicating the rights and privileges of the minority, not only against the arbitrary will of the majority in Parliament, but against the Crown. These rules are valuable to us here for the purpose of checking the ebullition of feeling, if you please, of the people—of our masters—call them sovereigns, or by as high a denomination as you choose to give them. We owe loyalty to the people; I am one of them, and owe loyalty to them to a certain degree; but I would with as much resoluteness oppose what I consider to be their arbitrary will, the result of certain circumstances or of an ebullition of passion, as I would that of a kingly tyrant upon his throne. Then I would rely upon going back to them to satisfy them of their true rights and interests.

The honorable Senator was pleased to say that I had likened this to the previous question. I only said that I concurred with the honorable Senator from New Hampshire—and he is right—that this would be one step forward to the introduction of that gag into the Senate by the restriction of debate. But the honorable Senator misunderstood me. I expressly said that I had no objection to cutting off debate on amendments, establishing a limited previous question with regard to amendments. But I would not cut off the privilege of the minority—their right to call upon the majority to give their vote upon the amendments.

One word more with regard to the illustration he gave, that whenever a bill comes up here, if it is not pleasant to the majority of the Senate, and they do not see proper to discuss it, but think that it is out of season and inappropriate to claim their attention, what exists now? He says the very thing which the honorable Senator proposes with regard to any amendment. You can move to lay it on the table, and it will be done if the majority think proper to do so, and there it goes and stops all discussion. But the distinction is, that there is no mischief done, except a negative one. The very reason upon which the privileges of the majority are founded does not relate in any degree to what is stated by the honorable Senator. The reason given is, because it is obnoxious to the majority. If you vote to lay it aside in that case, you do no harm to the country. There is no inroad made upon the ancient policy. But the privilege of the minority is to defeat a measure which is hurried forward with an indiscreet and arbitrary zeal by the arbitrary members of an overruling majority. The privilege of a minority is to have a vote upon the amendments, to check the majority, and bring them to vote upon certain features of policy brought to bear upon the main measure which they are compelled to vote upon.

I do not mean to enter more earnestly into this.

I merely throw out these suggestions; and I will state again, if you would apply the proposed amendment to the rule at the close of the session, to the appropriation bills, or to any bill of general importance that comes up at the close of the session, I should not have the least objection to it; but as a general alteration of the old and fundamental modes of proceeding, I object to it if it is to be permanent, and applicable at all times and to all measures; not that we should have privilege of debate, but that we should have the privilege of bringing the Senate to vote upon an amendment appropriate to the subject; for I take it, although the Chair has no right to rule out improper amendments, the body can say, under the general parliamentary law, although not required in our rules, that they are improper.

Mr. BADGER. I do not exactly understand the ground which my friend from Tennessee occupies on this subject. He says that the right to have the amendments presented, considered, and voted upon belongs to the minority, because it is the right of the minority to defeat a bill or measure which the majority desire to pass.

Mr. BELL. I did not say that. I beg leave to explain, that the honorable Senator may not misunderstand me. I say these rules are grounded upon long-considered usages in the parliamentary history of Great Britain and of this country, to a great extent, for the protection of the minority. Not that they have a right to defeat the majority, but for the protection of the minority against the arbitrary legislation of an overwhelming majority.

Mr. BADGER. I understood the honorable Senator to say that it was the right of the minority to defeat a measure which was pressed forward with an arbitrary and unconsidered haste by the majority.

Mr. BELL. The honorable Senator, I hope, does not wish to put me in an absurd and ridiculous attitude in regard to this. I said that the minority have a right to offer a pertinent amendment, to compel the majority to look at the principles of the amendment. That is the mode in which the minority operate. Not that they have any right to defeat the will of the majority, except by reasoning, by justice, and by sound policy; showing them and the country generally, that they will go too far if they adopt the general measure they propose without incorporating the amendment offered by the minority. 'This is one of the means instituted by the parliamentary law of giving the minority the right to call upon the majority to test their sense on other provisions which the minority think proper to bring forward connected with the main subject not disconnected with it.

Mr. BADGER. It seems, then, this right of the minority is not the right to defeat the majority against the will of the majority, but it is the right of argument and sound reason. That is nothing more than the right which was claimed by a celebrated officer, of stopping every man he met in the streets of Messina—but not against his will. There is no doubt if the minority convince the majority that they are wrong, they will prevent the passage of the obnoxious measure, not by overruling the majority, but by getting the majority on their own side until, at least, it would be the will of the majority not to pass the measure. But where is all the difficulty which arises here? Here is a proposition offered: my friend says if it is germane to the matter in hand it ought to be considered. Who are to decide whether it is germane?—the mover? The question has been raised here since I have been in the Senate, three or four times, and it has been expressly decided according to the general parliamentary law of England, that a question of relevancy is not a question of a point of order; and that the Presiding Officer cannot rule out an amendment because he deems it impertinent to the subject before the body. It must be voted down by the body, if it is irrelevant, and they do not choose to adopt it. Manifestly this must be so without a rule. What hinders us putting forty bills together, unless we have some rule of our own to prevent it? Where was the provision ingrafted for abolishing corporal punishment in the Navy? Upon an appropriation bill. Was it germane to it? Had it anything to do with the appropriation of money? Certainly not. The question, then, is, whether it shall not be for the majority to decide whether the measure proposed as an amendment is pertinent to the main subject or not; and if they think it is not, to put it out of the way as unnecessary to be then considered, or, perhaps, unnecessary to be considered at all. That is the whole measure. It interferes with no privilege of the minority, and it leaves to the majority what I have always been taught to believe was their right; that is, to decide upon and direct the measures of the body. I want to maintain no privilege which puts it in my power to overrule the majority. But a reasonable latitude of debate in the present case we have. There will be no difficulty upon that point. The courtesy of the Senate has allowed it to go too far, rather than manifesting a disposition to improperly control debate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish to express one idea for the consideration of the Senate, to show that there can be nothing in the objection made by my friend from Tennessee.

Mr. BELL. I should be glad to have you do so.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think I will convince the Senator himself, if he will listen to the expression of the idea. His objection is, that if my proposition be adopted, it will restrict the rights of the minority in reference to discussion, and thereby deprive them of the privilege of exposing the errors of the majority.

Mr. BELL. I did not say that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand the tenor of the objection is, that a dominant majority may trample upon the rights of the minority. I wish to show that it is impossible that that can be. A bill, I do not care what its character may be, is pending before the Senate. I rise to move to amend it. The amendment which I offer is either pertinent and relevant to the matter of the bill, or it is a substantive and distinctive proposition, having no relation to the matter of the bill. It must be one or the other; it can be nothing else. It either qualifies the matter of the bill in some of its relations, or it is a distinct, independent question, having no connection with the matter of the bill. Suppose it be one of these distinct, independent questions, having nothing to do with the matter of the bill; the amendment which I propose to the rule only authorizes the Senate to say, we will not consider that; we will lay it upon the table. How does that affect the rights of the minority? How does it prevent the minority from exposing, by discussion, the errors of a dominant and tyrannical majority? It is utterly impossible that it can have any effect of that sort. The only effect is, that it will allow the majority to say: This independent proposition of yours, having no relation or connection with the merits of the bill itself, shall be laid aside. That disposes of every amendment of that sort. How, then, is it with reference to an amendment which will qualify the main proposition of the bill, to enlarge it, to restrict it in point of time, or in reference to its operation upon society? I can rise, and move my amendment, restricting the main proposition, enlarging it, or qualifying it in any way. A Senator moves to lay that amendment on the table. There is no discussion until that vote is taken; and the amendment which would qualify the main matter of the bill is laid upon the table. What is left to me? And this is the idea which induced me to rise. I can get up and oppose the bill upon the very ground that the dominant tyrannical majority refused, by the amendment which I offered, to allow me to qualify the bill in its operations, and make it acceptable to the country; and I can show in debate, that for the want of that very amendment, which the majority have laid on the table, the bill will be injurious to my constituents, and to the whole country. In that way, by discussion and debate, I can place the responsibility of the majority upon such a footing that the whole country will see it. Can anything be plainer than all that? Nothing, sir; nothing.

In reference to the point between my friend from Tennessee and my friend from North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER,] I recollect an instance which probably my friend from Tennessee will recollect. When we had a general appropriation bill some years ago up for consideration, a Senator from Wisconsin offered an amendment, proposing a government for the Territories of New Mexico and California. The question came up whether that was in order; and I believe my friend from Tennessee made a speech, showing that that proposition for a territorial government was in order, by way of amendment to the appropriation bill.

I am sorry to have detained the Senate thus long upon a proposition which everybody seems to admit in principle ought to be adopted; and I thank my friends from Mississippi [Mr. ADAMS] and North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER,] for the support which they have given to it. I am only afraid, now, that it will really be killed by that disease called cacoethes loquendi—that we will speak it to death, and, perhaps, never get it up again.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I appreciate, certainly as highly as the honorable Senator from North Carolina does, the courtesy of the Senate; and I think we have had, perhaps, an excess of it. The honorable Senator says he has always been in the minority here, and has had no reason to complain. Well, there have been two minorities, and one is a little smaller than the other, and I have been in the smaller minority. [Laughter.] I wish to refresh the recollection of those who are disposed to glorify themselves upon the uniform courtesy of the Senate, with one decision which stands upon your records, and is now part of the law which you, sir, I suppose, are bound to administer until it is revoked or reconsidered by the Senate. It was solemnly decided by a Vice President of the United States, whom the Constitution made the presiding officer of this body, that it was in order, parliamentary, and rightful, for one member of this body to charge another with introducing propositions into the body, not for the purpose of business, not for the purpose of debate, but simply for amusement; that it was in order to charge a member with introducing matters into this body to make mere amusement for himself and others. A Vice President decided that that was parliamentary and in order, and, upon an appeal taken from the decision of the Vice President, this courteous body—courteous I grant to excess, cacoethes of courtesy—decided that that was right, and that is the parliamentary, senatorial rule here to-day. According to that, I may, if I please, charge the honorable Senator from Kentucky, not with any desire of having these rules amended, but of introducing this proposition here merely to gratify a love of fun and amusement—to set a mass of speeches going. That is the law of the Senate now, solemnly settled upon an appeal taken from a decision of the Vice President. I doubt whether we can find in the parliamentary history of the Commons, or the Lords spiritual or temporal, of Great Britain, a decision which may be characterized with worse adjectives than that. I will not make the attempt; I will let that go, and let it stand. So much, sir, for the experience which some minorities have had, different from other minorities. And when the honorable Senator from North Carolina speaks of the courtesy extended to minorities, he should remember, that as there are different degrees of comparison in grammar, so there are different degrees of minorities in politics,—at least so I find it.

Now, sir, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact, which cannot be denied, that this is a step in the measure of restriction and in the matter of restriction. But with all the restrictions with which the process of business has been hampered in the other branch of the National Legislature, we do business here forty times as fast, and with forty times the facility that they do, with all their previous questions, and with all the ingenious devices with which they have cumbered their rules to embarrass debate. It is a fact, of which I have been informed to-day while I have been here, that, with all the facilities which the House have for doing business, they have not called through their committees since about the first two weeks of the session; and they have been waiting for nearly six months, and have not done what we do here every morning on which we have a session; that is, call through the committees. With all their devices, it would seem as if ingenuity was a task, instead of facilitating, to embarrass, hinder, and obstruct business.

I say—and I concur with the suggestions made by the honorable Senator from Tennessee—that this privilege of proposing amendments, and of bringing the Senate to a vote upon amendments, is one of the great privileges of a minority.

Mr. President, I appreciate the privileges of a minority much more than you do. They are dearer to me. I know but little of what are the privileges of a majority; very little. But if there are any privileges which a minority have, let us keep them. I suspect that if the honorable Senator from North Carolina will search the bottom of his heart, he will find that now he begins to lose his tender regard for the rights of minorities from a lurking scepticism in his mind as to whether what is now the majority will continue to be so, and whether things are not to be turned upside down, and those who have heretofore found themselves in the minority are to be translated into the majority. I confess, sir, that the honorable Senator from North Carolina was one of the last men on this floor whom I expected to find advocating an amendment of this character.

Take a single naked proposition; you cannot defeat it. What is one of the most obvious rights of a minority in such a case? It is to present amendments in every way and shape and form in which ingenuity can devise them, and bring the body to a vote upon those amendments; so that by possibility the measure, if it cannot be defeated, may be shorn of some of its most objectionable features, or may have something added to it by virtue of which it will be made more acceptable to the minority and to the country. But this resolution proposes at one fell swoop to cut that all off, and by the iron and inexorable rule of laying upon the table—which precludes all debate—to prevent gentlemen from presenting their measures and elucidating the views which they may entertain upon the proposition which they may make, and to cut this off at once and bring the body to a direct vote upon the simple and naked proposition, and nothing else. I say, sir, that a more alarming blow, one more eminently calculated to cut off the rights of minorities, cannot well be conceived.

It is idle for gentlemen to flatter themselves that we are in no danger here—that we are the wisest and most virtuous, and liberal-minded people that ever lived, and that there is no danger of the approach of tyranny or despotism in this or in the other branch of Congress. Sir, I do not believe it. Human nature is human nature. Power is power; and it is always stealing away from the hands of the many into the hands of the few, and they will exercise it. We ought not to surrender any safeguard which the experience and wisdom of the past have found and preserved, and handed down to us for guarding these rights.

I feel for myself—and I will not speak for anybody else, for I do not know that there is anybody else in my situation—a delicacy about this matter. After having enjoyed this power for five years, just as I am about to leave this body, vacate this seat of power, and go out amongst the people, I am unwilling that he who sits in my seat after me, shall sit here hampered and restricted by a rule that I have imposed upon him just about the time I am leaving, and which I have not thought necessary to govern and restrain myself during the term I sat here. For this reason I desire that the proposed alteration of the rules shall not be adopted at this time. At all events I hope that if it is to be adopted, its adoption will be postponed until the new order of things. I hope it will be postponed till that problem which is lurking in the mind of the Senator from North Carolina, is settled, whether minorities are to be minorities, and majorities to be majorities; and when that day dawns, and that problem is demonstrated, let those who have the power change the rules; but let us not do it at this time.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, I confess that the questions raised by the Senator from Tennessee, addressed themselves to me with very great force. I recollect a discussion which took place in the Senate some year ago, upon a proposition then introduced, to adopt the "previous question." Although this is not the same proposition, yet it is but a modification of it. The rules of Parliament, as I understand them, and the rules which are framed for the government of this body, are not only intended to facilitate, as suggested by the honorable Senator from North Carolina, the dispatch of business, and to direct it according to the will of the majority, but they are intended to impose limitations upon an absolute and arbitrary majority; and all those limitations are founded in the philosophy and the propriety, to some extent, of protecting the rights of the minority.

What is the proposition before us? The proposition offered by the Senator from Kentucky is, that it should be in order to propose to lay upon the table any amendment, or any amendment to an amendment, and that the vote laying such amendment upon the table shall not carry with it the original proposition. Sir, these rules for the government of deliberative bodies, are rules founded in wisdom. The rule is, that a motion to lay a proposition upon the table, precludes debate, because, if it is the pleasure of the majority no longer to consider the subject, it would be useless to debate it; and if they declare that it shall be laid upon the table, it dispenses with the whole subject, and takes it from before the body for the time being. But, if you are at liberty to preclude a minority, or any member of a deliberative body from proposing to modify in any form, and to assign his reasons for the modification, without taking the whole subject from the deliberation of the body, then you not only deprive the minority of the right of expressing its opinion why the subject should be modified, as proposed by the amendment; but, as has been strongly and ably said by the Senator from Tennessee, you prevent the minority from bringing the majority to a vote upon that proposition.

The amendment to the rules offered by the Senator from Kentucky is intended to apply to all measures which may be brought before this body, of every kind and description whatsoever; and, if it prevails, you will deprive the minority of the body from so modifying a measure proposed by the majority as to make it acceptable to them. It may be that upon some great measure that is to affect the interests of the country, the minority would have it in their power to make the measure acceptable to them by modifying it; and yet, if a majority can lay upon the table the proposition to modify or amend, and preclude debate upon it, they are enabled to present themselves in the attitude of insisting upon a naked vote on the proposition as they presented it, without the opportunity, on the part of others, to modify or explain it in any degree whatsoever.

Mr. ADAMS. If the Senator will allow me, I beg leave to make a suggestion here. When a proposition is before the Senate and an amendment is offered, the individual offering the amendment has the floor, and can submit his views upon it at large. The Senate can have the benefit of the views of the individual who proposes the amendment, and then can say whether or not they will lay it upon the table. The individual would have the floor, and, of course, as the motion to lay on the table must come from some other person, the mover of the proposition would have the benefit of a speech upon the subject; and if, after the mover should have made a speech, the majority should think it proper to lay the amendment upon the table, I cannot see that it would produce any difficulty.

Mr. MASON. Then the debate is to be confined to the mover, and the mover only. Now, it may be that it is not the mover only who desires that the amendment shall prevail; it is not the mover only who desires that the enormity of the original proposition should be explained and exposed by the amendment which has been offered, and you take from them not only the right to debate, but the still greater and the inestimable right of bringing the majority to a vote upon it.

Sir, it has been said, and wisely said, that the minority in all bodies have one right, at least, of which they ought not to be deprived—the right to complain, and to let their complaint be heard. The honorable Senator from North Carolina says that he has been for a long time in a minority upon this floor, and it may be that he will so continue, and yet he is willing to give to the majority this absolute and unrestrained right of stifling the voice of a minority upon propositions to amend.

I may feel more sensitive upon this subject than some, because I come from a quarter of the Union that is in a minority elsewhere, and I am here in a deliberative body formed of the representatives of confederated States; not a body where a majority has a right, by the mere power of the majority, to control the rest of a body composed of the representatives of confederated States. There are great questions which have heretofore arisen, and may hereafter arise, in regard to which it may become a matter of the last importance to the minority in this Confederation to be able to explain and expose, in every possible form in the shape of amendments, the objections that they hold to the measure proposed by the majority. God forbid that it should ever recur again. But when measures of great national interest were before us, some few years ago, your table, sir, was covered with amendments—amendments coming from the minority of this Union, the objects of which were, in the main, either to expose the measure proposed by the majority, or to mitigate its force. Could it have been tolerated then, that debate should have been cut off on those amendments?

Now, if there be any inconvenience arising from this cacothesis spoken of by other Senators, I apprehend it is very small, compared with the injury which will be sustained by the Republic, if the minority in this respect of modifying and improving measures be taken from them. I agree with those Senators who have said, that if the time of the Republic is wasted in unnecessary debate, it is far better than that the Treasury of the Republic should be wasted by inordinate expenditures. We suffer vastly more by too much than by too little legislation. I think Senators will say that I take up as little time in debate as any gentleman on this floor; but I will remark that, although it is said in common parlance that your time is wasted in debate, I am not one of those who believe time is wasted. Ours is a government of public opinion. It is not a government of force. It is not a government of absolute will. It is a government controlled and directed by the opinions and judgments of the people. It is right that the people should have information to the fullest extent of every shade and view of opinion that pervades the Senators upon this floor. I feel some interest that this amendment should not prevail. I do not mean to ask that it be laid on the table; but I ask that when the vote be taken upon it, it be taken by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the resolution will be read as modified.

It was accordingly read, as follows:

Resolved, That the thirtieth rule of the Senate be amended by adding thereto the following:

"On motion any amendment offered to a bill or resolution, or an amendment to an amendment, may be ordered to lie on the table, without carrying the bill or resolution with it."

Mr. CASS. Mr. President, it is a singular commentary upon the charge of the predisposition of a majority in this body to exercise tyranny over a minority, that this measure has been introduced and principally advocated by gentlemen in the minority—gentlemen who have sat here for years and seen the operation and conduct of the Senate. I repeat, it is a very singular commentary upon that charge.

I have no respect myself—or very little, at any rate, and that little is growing less—for the metaphysics of parliamentary law. Sometimes I am inclined to believe we should get along better if we had no parliamentary law and scarcely any rules; but, at any rate, I have no belief in the obligations of any English parliamentary law here, any more than I have of the obligation of those whose official station there requires it, to wear wigs or robes, and that the masters who bring in a bill shall make three bows before they get to the Speaker's chair. I believe these matters are regulated here by both bodies of Congress, and regulated in their own way. Nor do I believe in another thing—that there is the slightest danger in this country of a majority, in either of these bodies, tyrannizing over a minority. I think that two gentlemen in the minority, who have spoken, have done but simple justice to the majority. There is no such predisposition. The public would put an end to it at once, if there were. We talk of public opinion. Why, it is not made here. There is no greater mistake that can be made of the American people, than to suppose that public opinion originates from discussions in these bodies, and is sent from here to the people. Why, how many thousands and tens of thousands, yea, hundreds of thousands, are there in our country, just as competent to sit here and administer the affairs of this Government as any member who occupies a seat in this body, or in the other House.

No, sir; public opinion comes to us, and, thank God, we have felt it a number of times since I have been here. It is not made by us, but it comes to us, and often influences great measures of public policy. I have not that belief in the miraculous power of discussion which many men have—I speak now of Congressional discussion. I believe the power of this country depends on the intelligence of the people, and not on the discussions in these bodies. But I am aware not only of the right but of the importance of discussion.

Now, this proposition is what? Why, that when a bill has been before you, and has been discussed time after time, or, if you please, week after week, or, as we have sometimes seen, almost month after month, and a gentleman gets up and offers an amendment, which amendment is or is not appropriate, I do not care which, and it is debated, you may dispose of the amendment at once, and thus get rid of weeks of discussion upon it. Now, in the name of common sense, putting all metaphysics out of the way, why should not a majority have just as much power to put an end to the amendment as to put an end to the principal subject? That is what I cannot make out, for the soul of me. You give a majority a right to put their hands on the original proposition, and lay it on the table, and yet you cannot touch an accessory part of it that is introduced and may be equally discussed, without touching the whole. I say it is perfectly unreasonable. The power may be abused undoubtedly. All parliamentary power, all other power, may be abused. All you can do is to check it in a proper way. The right of putting your hands upon a bill may be abused. The right of discussion may be abused, and we have seen it abused by that clock. It is absolutely essential—it has been so found in this and in the other body, and in all legislative bodies—that a power should exist with the majority by which at times they shall force to a determination important public measures.

Now, I repeat, you may abuse the power to put a bill upon the table; you may abuse the power to put an amendment to a bill upon the table. Gentlemen seem to suppose that the moment an amendment is started it is to be put upon the table. You may do so, but there is not the slightest probability in the world of that abuse of power. The amendment will be discussed as the original bill is discussed, until a majority get tired of it—until they see that it is only a cloak for continuing discussion unnecessarily, and then they put their hands upon it precisely as they would put their hands upon the original bill, and lay it upon the table. Under this view of it, I can see no possible objection to the measure, unless there is objection to all power of this description; and if there is, why then there is an end to all legislative proceedings. I shall support the resolution.

Mr. PEARCE. Mr. President, I cannot agree with the Senator from Michigan. I know that the practice of this body has been exceedingly liberal and courteous. I do not know that I recollect any instance of oppression by a majority here, but I do recollect, and have felt, the oppressions of a majority elsewhere. I have seen freedom of debate trampled on. I have seen that deliberation which was absolutely necessary to an understanding of the question, put an end to by the power which the rules of the House of Representatives have conferred upon a majority. And though I do not think it very likely that, in the course of a short space of time, we shall witness in this House any violation of the rights of the minority, I do think that the time may come—I know that it may come, and I believe that it will come—when, if you furnish the majority with the instrument of oppression, which I think the proposed alteration of the rule will afford, they will use it. It is only by allowing the free offering of amendments, and their free and full discussion, that the rights of the minority can be sustained. This right of offering and discussing amendments may be abused, I know, but this abuse is, at all events, a very trifling inconvenience compared with the much more serious inconvenience that may arise from denying that freedom. You cannot deny that privilege without impairing the freedom of discussion, and limiting the opportunities of deliberation. We know very well, sir, that oftentimes a majority would be unwilling to give a direct negative vote upon a question, but would be perfectly ready to put it aside indirectly, by supporting a motion to lay it upon the table.

Besides this, the responsibility of public men cannot be so well enforced, if you pass such a rule as this which is now recommended. But I will not consume the time of the Senate. It has already been occupied long enough upon this subject. I wish, however, before I vote on this proposition—which I shall certainly vote against—to put on record, in a more positive form, my decided objection to it; for I do believe, that if it be not now an instrument of tyranny, the time will inevitably come when it will be so. It may be so used—and it will be, if you depart from that general parliamentary law which seems to have been most wisely and systematically devised, and is far more convenient in practice than any set of rules which temporary exigencies may suggest.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, on the resolution proposing to amend the rules, resulted—yeas 21, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Badger, Bradbury, Brodhead, Cass, Clarke, Dawson, De Saussure, Dodge of Wisconsin, Felch, Fish, Houston, James, Jones of Iowa, Mallory, Miller, Smith, Toucey, Underwood, Upham, and Wade—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Atchison, Bell, Borland, Brooke, Charlton, Clemens, Cooper, Davis, Dodge of Iowa, Downs, Foot, Hale, King, Mason, Morton, Norris, Pearce, Pratt, Sebastian, Sumner, and Walker—21.

So it was rejected.

COMPENDIUM OF THE PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

On the motion of Mr. BRADBURY, the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to the consideration of the joint resolution providing for a compendium of the annual public documents. It requests the President, at the commencement of each future session of Congress, or as soon thereafter as may be practicable, to cause to be prepared a compendium of the public documents accompanying the President's message, and the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury on the finances, and on commerce and navigation, and of such other reports of any of the Secretaries as may be of general interest, embracing only the more important portions, for the purpose of being printed in a single volume, as a substitute for the extra numbers of these documents heretofore published.

Mr. BRADBURY. Mr. President, it will be necessary that I occupy but a very few moments in giving a brief explanation of the objects of this resolution. It is designed to obtain, in a compact form, the valuable portions of the annual public documents submitted with the President's message, omitting the unimportant matter. It is not designed to supersede the printing of the documents in extenso, so far as they may be necessary for the use of members of Congress, or of public libraries; but that this compendium shall take the place of the extra numbers which we ordinarily publish of these documents. I have examined the President's message and accompanying documents, laid before Congress at the present session, and I will refer to them to show the necessity of such a compendium as I propose.

The message and documents comprise three volumes, embracing, generally, reports from the heads of Departments and from the chiefs of bureaus. Two volumes have been already received. These two volumes comprise 1,019 pages, and I am informed that the remaining volume will contain 750 pages. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury on Commerce and Navigation occupies 395 pages, and his report on the Finances 88 pages more. Thus we have five volumes spreading over a space of 2,252 pages coming into Congress at the commencement of the session. This does not include the report of the Commissioner of Patents, which occupies two volumes, and covers 1,150 pages more, as the resolution does not touch that report; but I take this occasion to say that it ought to be compressed into a much smaller space, and could be done at very great advantage. The various reports that are made from time to time during the session are also excluded, and make no part of the volumes I have named. Of all the volumes over which the message and accompanying documents are spread out, we are in the habit of publishing a large edition of extra numbers. I will refer to some of these volumes for a single moment, and ask the Senate to examine their contents. I look into the two volumes already published, and I find that accompanying the President's message are numerous papers from the Department of State, many of which are of no interest to the general reader, and also voluminous documents accompanying the report of the Secretary of War, respecting military and Indian affairs in Texas, New Mexico, California, Oregon, and Florida, and extended details in the reports of chiefs of the military bureaus, to some of which I beg leave to refer, as specimens by way of illustration. There are tables respecting

"The organization of the Army;"

"The general returns of the Army;"

"The position and distribution of troops," in various departments;

"Statements of supplies forwarded;"

"Detailed statements of the number of hired teamsters furnished to detachments of troops, and the means of transportation," &c.

"Abstract of building materials used" at various military posts; and "Tables of observations, showing changes in the bottom at the site of the screw-pile light-house on Brandywine Shoals, in the Delaware bay."

In volume II. there is a long "List of contracts under the cognizance of the Bureau of Construction, Equipment, and Repairs," occupying forty pages.

There is a "List of offers to furnish naval supplies," occupying some twenty pages.

"Offers for supplies to the dry-dock, New York;"

"Offers for the annual supplies for the Norfolk navy-yard;" and a "List of contracts under the cognizance of the Bureau of Yards and Docks," occupying one hundred and thirty pages.

Let us look at the character of some of these. In this schedule of contracts, comprising one hundred and thirty pages, we have the names of contractors, and particular articles contracted for in detail, like the following:

William A. Bickford:

14	pieces of white pine,	18 feet long.
14	" "	18 " "
2	" "	15 " "
2	" "	15 " "
130	" "	8 " "

And so on for page after page in minute detail.

We publish ten thousand copies of these documents, and send them abroad over the country, for the use of the general reader, containing details thus minute and unimportant, and of no conceivable utility to any but a small number of persons.

Every one is aware that the matter ordinarily wanted for general use might be comprised in a single volume of moderate size, and such a volume would be worth more to almost every person than the whole five now are. Another inconvenience would be obviated by the compendium. The number of volumes now accumulate so fast that it is inconvenient to preserve them, for in the course of a few years, they make of themselves a large library. I would like to inquire of honorable Senators if they have not already experienced great inconvenience arising from this source, as well as from the fact that the important information contained in these documents, is spread over so wide a surface, and is only to be found, after wading through so many pages of unimportant detail.

On the score of value and convenience, the abstract would be worth more to members of Congress even than the documents in extenso, though it is proposed that they shall have both. Another purpose would be effected by the preparation of this compendium. It would secure a great saving of expense, and is therefore recommended by every principle of economy as well as convenience. We publish a large issue of extra numbers—the present year ten thousand copies, after providing those necessary for our own use. Now ten thousand copies of the five volumes are equivalent to fifty thousand volumes of the single compendium. Ten thousand volumes of the compendium would save nearly four fifths of the expense; and if we doubled that number, we should double the amount of valuable information now furnished by the distribution of the documents, and save at least one half the expense. Again, and it is matter of very frequent complaint amongst our constituents, that few obtain, or are able to obtain, a perfect set of the public documents. The compendium would furnish to individuals generally a document of service to them, answering all the purposes of the full set. It would ordinarily furnish them every fact important for them to know. It is believed that it will not be found difficult for the President to cause the Secretaries, when they prepare their annual reports, to prepare also an abstract or compendium of the valuable portions of them, so that it may be submitted with the documents at large. It may be said that we have no guarantee that the compendium will contain such matter as may be needed, or such as we shall desire to publish. I apprehend no practical difficulty will be found on that score, for when the documents are sent on, if anything should be omitted which we should desire to have inserted, it will be easy to cause the deficiency to be supplied. When the compendium is submitted, it will be in the power of either House of Congress to regulate the whole matter by publishing such number of it as they shall see fit, and such number also of the documents in extenso. My conviction is, that if we will try the experiment a great saving will be made, and a great convenience effected. I think that there can be no objection to it, and I hope that the resolution will receive favorable consideration.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Senate have, I think with very great wisdom, refused one innovation upon our rules; and though my vote has uniformly been given in favor of cutting off the great expenditures for the printing of books, yet I must say that I feel constrained to go against this particular proposition; and I think that the reasons suggested by the honorable Senator from Maine, will convince every gentleman who will listen to the matter, that this is entirely wrong. He proposes to make a compendium of public documents. How large that compendium is to be he has not told us.

Mr. BRADBURY. It is to be a single volume.

Mr. HALE. A single volume. But the Senator may learn that volumes are of different sizes. There is "Jack the Giant Killer," a very small volume, which you can hold on one finger; and then there is "Fox's Book of Martyrs," which is still one volume, but it would require one stout boy to carry it. So that "a single volume" does not convey a very distinct idea to the mind. Suppose you appoint a committee, or trust it to one of the Secretaries, to make a compendium of the important and useful matters which are comprised in these public documents. There is a very large class of the community who think that the most important and most useful information which can be given to the country, is that very part which the honorable Senator has read to the Senate to show its uselessness, and that is the lists of contracts, and names of the contractors. He says these tables take up one hundred and thirty pages. Why, there are a great many of the most astute, eagle-eyed, and acute men in the country who do not read anything else in these documents. If there is a single subject which should be fully exposed to the country, it is that. If there is a subject where there has been abuse, fraud, cheating, favoritism, plundering of the Treasury, illegally putting the proceeds of the public Treasury into the pockets of favorites, it is in regard to this very matter of contracts and furnishing of supplies. If there is a single thing that ought to be exposed, and watched with scrutiny, and guarded with care, it is that very list of contracts and offers to furnish supplies, with the names of the contractors. Sir, the names tell more than whole volumes. Sometimes the names of contractors may be covered up. That should not be so; and if the politics of the contractors could also be given, I would be willing to have the documents made a little larger, to include that. That is one matter which the Senator wants abridged; and I venture to say, that whenever you get a committee to undertake to make an abridgment of these documents, they will abridge them in that very particular in which the great mass of the country will want information.

The honorable Senator objects to some of these observations that have been made about something—I do not know what—possibly the tides, possibly the heavens. Well, sir, there is a large class of men to whom these observations are the most interesting. Just according to the temper and disposition of the committee that is to make the compendium, the compendium will be made to suit their peculiar views and their peculiar tastes, and nobody else. The probability is, that our public documents, in this compendious form, will not be worth a straw.

Now, I think that if there is to be an amendment in regard to this matter, that amendment should go deeper than this, and that we should not print so many numbers of documents which are not really interesting. But, of all the forms in which reform has suggested itself, I may be permitted to say—with all deference to the honorable Senator from Maine, who has given this subject a good deal of attention, and who is, I know, desirous of retrenching and reforming expenditures—that I do think—it may be my weakness, it is certainly not my obstinacy—that he has hit upon the worst form. This idea of a compendium, unless you can tell beforehand what it is to consist of, and how large a per centum of the documents it is to contain, is one that is liable to the greatest abuse, and will do the least to remedy the evil complained of; because it is impossible to satisfy the public mind in this way; it is various. The old saying has it, that there are “many men of many minds,” and what may be highly interesting to one will be looked upon with calm indifference by another; and it will be impossible to make a compendium which will meet the public expectation. For these reasons I am opposed to it.

Mr. BRADBURY. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from New Hampshire finds an objection to this resolution which I think arises from not understanding precisely what the resolution contemplates. The Senator argues as if it were proposed to do away with the printing of the documents in extenso. The object of the resolution is, that the compendium may take the place, so far as may be necessary, of the extra numbers which are ordinarily published, and not to do away the printing of the documents at length for the use of Congress. I expected the opposition of the Senator, for I believe I have seldom moved a proposition here which has not met with his opposition in some form. But I think that a little reflection will show the honorable Senator that there is no just foundation for the apprehensions he has expressed. The honorable Senator says that some individuals will be very anxious to know the names of contractors, &c., and therefore he thinks it is very important that we shall publish ten thousand copies of a book of which one hundred and thirty pages in one body are made up to a great extent of the most minute details—the little items and particulars, such as the length of a piece of board, or the number of joists that may have been furnished. I will read one or two specimens:

- “A dozen pieces of India rubber;”
- “Twelve dozen lead pencils;”
- “Two counting-house parallel rules;”
- “Four dozen linen tape,” &c.

Does the honorable Senator suppose that great information is to be furnished by sending abroad these minute details, and that there the public will look with very great interest to learn that a particular individual furnished “four pieces of red tape?” It is this abuse, perpetrated in printing volumes of this useless detail for distribution, that I wish to correct. It is a waste of the public money that we should avoid. All this minuteness is proper in a report to Congress; but out of place when it is sent to the general reader.

A sufficient number of the documents at large can be published for all the purposes to which the Senator alludes. If there is any such thing as correcting abuses by publishing these reports, the ordinary number will answer that purpose. But these documents are multiplying upon us every year. I have already alluded to the five volumes which have been submitted to Congress at this session, in addition to which we are to have two more in the report of the Commissioner of Patents, and there will be several others in the course of the session. We are all sensible of the great inconvenience arising from the fact that the valuable information in the public documents is scattered through so many volumes, and it is to furnish a book remedying this inconvenience that I urge the compendium to be made. I hope the honorable Senator from New Hampshire will withdraw his opposition.

Mr. HALE. In the various debates which take place in the Senate, it is the part of those who address us, if they see any difficulty which can be removed, to suggest the mode by which it can be done; but I think it is captious and unkind to suggest a difficulty which cannot be removed by anything short of infinite power. The Senator from Maine [Mr. BRADBURY] says, that my difficulty is, that I do not understand. Now, that cannot be helped; understanding is a matter that is given to us by other powers, and if we have not got understanding enough to enable us to comprehend a subject, it is rather hard to twit us of it here.

But the Senator is mistaken on another point. He says that I have always opposed his propositions. I thought I had always agreed with him. I was with him on the subject of the French spoils. *—I was with him in the call that he made on General Taylor's administration to know why so many removals from office were made; and I have stuck by that from that day to this; and I hope it will be taken up again at this session. It is very rare indeed that I have differed with the Senator from Maine, and when I have, I have done it with great pain and great diffidence. But I had the misfortune to differ with him the other day, and he told me then that the same difficulty existed—that I did not understand the matter; but afterwards he deserted his understanding and came over to my misunderstanding. I think such an act as that should make him a little cautious, and teach him that understanding is not always to the wise, but that it is sometimes found with the simple.

With regard to this compendium, I think it is liable to another objection, and a very alarming one, and that is this: it is throwing a tremendous power into the hands of the President. The President is the administrator of patronage to the amount of $50,000,000, as the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BADGER] said the other day; and besides that, I think it will be conceded that the two platforms which have been adopted, make him head constable to catch runaway niggers, and that is about the whole of it. [Laughter.] His doings within the year are to be put in the public documents, and the Senator from Maine [Mr. BRADBURY] has argued that it makes a very large book. The President, in looking it over, may find some descriptions which he thinks ought not to go out to the country—possibly something connected with the administration of the fugitive slave law—and he tells the maker of the compendium it is useless to put that in, and to leave it out. Or there may be some matters which it is not convenient to let the country understand, and he will say to the committee, “I think it is entirely useless,” like the fox when he smelt the lion's breath, he will have a bad cold, and wont smell anything there, and omit it altogether. This compendium is one that would omit the most important matter, and that which would be most read. Then the power of saying what shall be put in it will be a very great power, which shall tell the people what they shall know about what has been going on. I think the Senator is mistaken when he attributes a want of importance to the views which I suggest. The observations which I made I think are true, that contracts with regard to supplies, and offers for furnishing them, are important, as they are the great means by which corrupt appliances are brought to bear, and by which favoritism rewards its favorites. I think the Senator from Maryland [Mr. PEARCE] could not illustrate the policy of the past Administration without bringing into the discussion, and prominently before the country, the doings of the Administration in regard to the supplies furnished in the matter of cheese. The quantity of cheese furnished formed no inconsiderable part of the discussion, and constituted no small portion of the supplemental speech of the Senator from Maryland afterwards.

Now, it is in no captious spirit, and with no desire to differ with the Senator from Maine, that I have opposed this resolution; and I do not know by what unfortunate accident I may have given rise to any such suspicion in his mind. I can assure him, with the most entire sincerity, there is nothing in it. It is from no desire of putting myself against that Senator, or of setting myself up against him, that I have taken the course which I have. I know my own powers too well. If I am not deeply versed in self-knowledge, if I had merely read its primer, I should know what an act of temerity and danger it would be to put myself in such a position in relation to him as the Senator has assumed. Sir, I might say, if it would be proper to indulge in a classical allusion, in such a case, non nostrum—it does not belong to me; I will not finish the quotation. I think this proposition to amend, if it can be called an amendment, is a dangerous one—that it is unsafe. If it have any practical effect, it will be a bad effect; it will throw power into the hands of the Administration, by which their acts may be covered up and concealed. For that reason I am opposed to it. If the documents are worth publishing at all, let us have that portion which is most valuable published; and do not let us give this dangerous power of making a compendium to any Administration. Let us take the whole or none, and let the people read whatever they please, and see what is its object.

Mr. BRADBURY. The objection which the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] now urges, that the preparation of the compendium will throw power into the hands of the President, is, I think, sufficiently answered by the fact that the President is only called upon to prepare the compendium, and submit it, with the documents at large. Congress will then have the power of examining that compendium through its committees, and of publishing, or of omitting to publish, as it may see fit. If the compendium shall be what we have reason to expect it will be, then it will be published. If it should contain a one-sided statement; if facts are omitted which should be incorporated, Congress can then make such corrections as may seem to be necessary. The power of correction will be at hand; and I apprehend that the only mode by which we can obtain a selection of the important portions of the documents, is that which I have suggested. There would be a difficulty in preparing a compendium through a committee of Congress; there would be a want of time; while a committee could, very readily, by examining that which had been prepared, ascertain its character, and remedy defects, if any were found to exist.

The honorable Senator seems to fear that the preparation of this compendium might lead to a concealment of the acts of an Administration, and we should be unprovided with the means of ascertaining what contracts had been made, and what frauds, if any, had been perpetrated. Allow me to remind him that we should have the means of judging, as we should have the documents in extenso, and all we propose is to provide a substitute for the extra numbers, and a convenient book of reference, for the purpose of obtaining information constantly wanted.

I was very far from intending to say anything unkind of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE,] in the remarks which I made. I know that he comprehends a subject very readily, and hence, enters into the discussion without any great deliberation; and I supposed that he had not noticed the fact that it was proposed to publish the documents at large as well as the compendium. I think that, on reflection, there will be but one opinion on this subject, and that the proposition will be looked on as designed to effect a desirable and important improvement.

Mr. BORLAND. I have thought a good deal of the inconvenience which the honorable Senator from Maine has suggested in offering this measure, and I think he is right in the desire which he manifests for the correction of these evils. I think they ought to be corrected; but with great respect for his opinion upon the subject, and the attention which I know he has given to it, I think he has not presented just such a measure as is necessary and proper to correct this evil. Though not now a member of the Committee on Printing, I served long enough on that committee to know something of the difficulties which that Senator suggests. I have found, upon a service of three years as chairman of that committee, that it is nearly impossible, if not absolutely so, to have the public printing, especially the printing of the public documents which come from the Executive, executed within a time when they will be of any use to either House of Congress, under the present system. Sir, there is not a Senator upon this floor that I know of, who has yet received the President's message, or any of the documents from the Departments, and yet the session of Congress is drawing to a close, and we have had nothing from the Departments on which to base our legislation. Seven months of the session are gone, and yet, if any member has received a copy of any of these documents, he has been more fortunate than I have. This is an evil that ought to be corrected—that is, if it is desirable to have these documents as the basis of our legislation. We cannot know what has been the action of the Government; we cannot have the facts which have been developed in the annual administration of the Government before us in such a way as to legislate understandingly upon all these measures. Who can tell now what is the condition of the Government, or what legislation is necessary to carry on the Government? We do not know what amount of money has been collected as revenue, or the source from which it has been collected, or the proportion in which the different sources have paid it in; nor do we know how much it has cost to administer the Government. I have sought to ascertain this with a good deal of care, and the documents are not to be had. They have been furnished to us, it is true, but they are in the hands of the printer in manuscript, and three fourths of the session have now passed, and it is impossible to derive anything like accurate knowledge of it. The course which has been adopted by some of the States to remedy evils of this sort has been, to some extent, similar to the one suggested by the Senator from Maine, namely, to require the Executive to have these documents printed and laid upon our tables at the beginning of the session. I do not see any other way in which the evils I have been speaking of can be remedied. It will not do to wait till the beginning of the session to have this large mass of documents brought here, and then to have to wait till the end of the session before they can be brought before us in a printed form, so that we can all become acquainted with their contents. If we desire to have these documents at all, we must have them in a tangible shape at the beginning of the session, which can only be done by the Executive having them printed and brought to us. The Senator from Maine proposes that this should be done, yet not fully; for he proposes that the President, instead of sending these whole documents to us, should make an abstract—

Mr. BRADBURY. The abstract is not proposed with the view of taking the place of the whole. The President will send the whole document; but in the mean time he will make an abstract—

Mr. BORLAND. I understand.

Mr. BRADBURY. I shall make it a distinct proposition that all these documents be printed and laid upon our tables when Congress comes together.

Mr. BORLAND. I did not understand the Senator from Maine [Mr. BRADBURY] to mean that the President should not send in all the documents; but I understood his proposition to be, that he should make this abstract, and have it printed, but that the documents, in extenso, should be sent to us in manuscript, as they are sent now, and that we should wait until they can be printed by the public printer before we can have them in that form. Now, simply, if we are required to take an abstract which the President and the Departments may send us as the basis of our legislation there is no necessity for having anything more. The mere abstract, the mere figures, will not be sufficient for that purpose; we require an explanation, and that explanation can only be given by the reports of the heads of Departments, together with such explanations as the President himself may make. If the information furnished by the heads of Departments is to be of any service at all, as the basis of legislation, it must come in extenso, in the manner in which heads of Departments feel it their duty to present to Congress a fair understanding of the subject. If, afterwards, they should see fit to go to the expense of printing those five large volumes of which the Senator from Maine has spoken, or, if we should deem it proper and expedient to reduce the size of that work to one small volume, certainly the proper manner to do it will be to refer each particular subject to the appropriate committee, and let that committee decide on what is important and valuable for preservation, or distribution among the people. To act understandingly on the subjects communicated to us we must have the figures before us, the explanation of the figures, together with the views of the Government, and the reasons which have controlled it in pursuing a certain course, and what they consider sufficient, or otherwise. We require this to enable us to arrive at a proper understanding of the subject, and control our own action in regard to it.

I do not propose to offer any amendment to the proposition now before the Senate; but I would suggest to the Senator from Maine to allow it to lie over, or to go to some committee, or to take some other step by which it can be modified, so that Senators may have an opportunity to express their views in regard to it, and thus remedy the evil complained of. I know no committee to which it can be more appropriately referred than the Committee on Printing, and therefore move that it be so referred.

Mr. MANGUM. I hope that this resolution will not pass the Senate. It would be an innovation which has never taken place at all, or anything approaching to it, in the history of the Government. Sir, you might as well call upon the President to give a compendium of his Executive message, as to give a compendious account of the accompanying documents. Whether for the truth of history, or the enlightening of members called upon to legislate, it is indispensable that we should have the whole amount of information thus conveyed. If you confer upon the President the power of giving us a mere compendious account of the proceedings of the year, it may be a one-sided affair; it may be drawn up to suit any purpose, anything, or anything else than to convey the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. I hope this innovation will not be adopted. It is true, sir, that I have seen annual messages that have come here, that might have been referred to a committee, and abbreviated without much loss of matter; yet, it is to be presumed that the Executive officers send nothing accompanying the President's message but what, in their opinion, is necessary to give such information as will enable us to legislate. And, sir, with the view of testing the opinion of the Senate on this question, I move to lay the resolution on the table, and on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken, resulted—yeas 14, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Badger, Bell, Brooke, Clarke, Davis, Dawson, Felch, Foot, Hale, Mangum, Miller, Morton, Norris, and Wade—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Borland, Bradbury, Brodhead, Cass, Charlton, Clemens, De Saussure, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Houston, Jones of Iowa, Mallory, Pratt, Sebastian, Smith, Sumner, Toucey, Upham, and Walker—21.

Mr. BORLAND. I now renew my motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BRADBURY. I hope that motion may prevail.

The motion was agreed to.

DONATIONS OF LANDS IN ARKANSAS.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I move that the Senate take up for consideration the bill to revive for a limited time an act in relation to donations of land to certain persons in the State of Arkansas.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that all claims to donations of land in the State of Arkansas, which have been adjudicated and allowed by the register and receiver of the proper land district, in virtue of the provisions of the eighth section of the act of Congress approved on the 24th of May, 1823, entitled "An act to aid the State of Ohio in extending the Miami canal from Dayton to Lake Erie, and to grant a quantity of land to said State, to aid in the construction of canals authorized by law, and for making donations of land to certain persons in 'Arkansas Territory,' and which have not been located and patent certificates issued therefor, or which, having been so located, were compelled to yield to other and prior rights, either in whole or in part, and not subsequently relocated within the period fixed by law, may be entered with the register of any one of the land offices in the State of Arkansas at any time within two years from the passage of this act, in the same manner and under the same restrictions and conditions as existed prior to the 24th day of May, 1838, and as continued in the act revived hereby: provided, that no such claim shall be so located against which fraud has been or may be alleged, until all objection thereto shall have been removed to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

There being no amendment offered, the bill was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

And then, on motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, June 24, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the consideration of House bill No. 280, making grants of land to the several States for educational and railroad purposes.

ALEXANDER P. FIELD.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. Before proceeding to the execution of the business of the morning hour, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to allow the Committee on the Judiciary to report a joint resolution from the Senate. I will state to the House that the passage of this resolution is a matter of great importance to a very worthy man, and unless passed now, it will be of no avail to him.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object, if it is to come out of the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman proposes to consider it before the House proceeds to the execution of the morning hour.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Let it be read for information.

It was read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department be authorized and directed to settle the accounts of Alexander P. Field, late Secretary of Wisconsin Territory, upon principles of justice and equity.

Mr. HARRIS. There is an amendment from the Judiciary Committee which I now ask to have read.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I am fearful it will consume too much time. I object to its reception.

Mr. HARRIS. I appeal to the gentleman to allow the amendment to be read. It will not take two minutes to pass the resolution, and it is very important that it should be passed now, if at all.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will withdraw my objection.

The amendment, which specified the items to be allowed, was then read.

Mr. DANIEL. I object.

Mr. HARRIS. If the gentleman, and the House, will allow me, I will state the fact, that a suit is pending against the sureties of this secretary. The court comes on early in the next month. It is very clear that the party is entitled to the credits provided for in this resolution. I hope gentlemen will withdraw all objection, and allow the resolution to pass.

Mr. DANIEL. I do not withdraw my objection.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. LOCKHART, by unanimous consent, presented resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Indiana, in relation to declaring the bridge over the Ohio river at Wheeling, Virginia, a post route; which were laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FOWLER, by unanimous consent, presented resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, concerning the Massachusetts militia claim; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Also, resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, in relation to National Intervention; which were laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

ARSON IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I am certain the House will give its unanimous consent to receive and pass the bill which I now ask leave to report from the Committee on the Judiciary. It is to prevent the crime of arson and for its punishment in the District of Columbia. It came from the Senate, with an amendment, and the amendment is a very proper one. It has been examined by the District Attorney of this District, and by the Committee on the Judiciary in the Senate, as well as that of the House. I ask the House, in view of the devastations which nightly occur in this city, in consequence of incendiaries, to take this bill up and pass it.

[Cries of "Agreed!"]

A MEMBER. Do not take it out of the morning hour.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I move to take up and dispose of this bill before we proceed to the execution of the special order for the morning hour. There was no objection.

The bill was accordingly received, read through as proposed to be amended, and the amendments were concurred in by the House.

GRANTS FOR RAILROADS.

The House then proceeded to the execution of the special order.

The SPEAKER. On yesterday the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNETT] moved to recommit House bill No. 280, making grants to the several States for railroads, &c., to the Committee on Public Lands, and upon that motion demanded the previous question.

Mr. GORMAN. I move a call of the House, and upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BENNETT. If it is in order, I propose to withdraw the call for the previous question and the motion to recommit, and ask the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. There is a privileged motion pending, that there be a call of the House; and until that is disposed of, the gentleman's proposition will not be in order.

The question was then taken upon ordering a call of the House, and the result was—yeas 55, nays 124.

So the House refused a call.

Mr. GORMAN. I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNETT] proposed to withdraw his demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman did propose to do so, but it was not then in order, and neither the call for the previous question nor the motion to recommit were withdrawn.

Mr. GORMAN. Well, I ask the gentleman from New York to withdraw the demand for the previous question upon the motion to refer this bill to the committee from whence it came.

Mr. BENNETT. I decline to withdraw the demand.

Mr. GORMAN. I insist that the gentleman withdraw the demand for the previous question, and permit some one from the West to be heard upon so important a bill as this—proposing, as it does, to give away sixty million acres of the public lands.

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Others will desire to be heard from other sections of the Union, too.

Mr. GORMAN. I should be happy to hear the gentleman from Georgia.

The SPEAKER. Discussion is out of order.

Mr. GORMAN. Again, I ask that some one from the Western States shall be heard upon this bill, before it is put upon its passage.

[Loud cries of "Order!"]

The previous question then received a second. The question recurring, Shall the main question be now put?

Mr. GORMAN demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. STUART. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether, if the House refuse to order the main question, it will not then be in order to move to recommit this bill?

The SPEAKER. That will be the pending question when the main question shall have been ordered.

Mr. STUART. But if the gentleman from New York withdraws the motion, will it not then be in order for any gentleman to move to recommit it?

The SPEAKER. It will be in order for any gentleman to do so, if he can get the floor for that purpose. That motion, however, as the Chair remarked, is already pending.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I wish to inquire whether, if the main question is ordered to be put, it will bring the House to a direct vote upon the passage of the bill?

The SPEAKER. It will bring the House to a vote first upon the motion to recommit the bill, and if that fail, then upon its passage.

The question was then taken upon ordering the main question to be put, and the result was—yeas 103, nays 79; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Charles Allen, Allison, William Appleton, Babcock, David J. Bailey, Barrere, Beale, Bell, Bennett, Bowie, Bowne, Brenton, Briggs, Brooks, George H. Brown, Burrows, Burt, E. Thompson, Townshend, Wallace, Wilcox, Woodward, and Yates—79.

So the main question was ordered to be put.

The SPEAKER. The first question now is upon the motion made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNETT] to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. STUART. On that motion I ask the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. As it seems to be the desire of the opponents of this bill to consume the time of the morning hour without coming to a vote upon this bill, I move that the House do now adjourn, and upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Does the gentleman want the House to adjourn?

Mr. STEPHENS. I do not; but I want the bill to be kept in a condition for action thereon.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken on the motion to adjourn, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 8, nays 170.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. COBB. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. COBB. Then I move to proceed to the consideration of business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. ASHE. Did the Chair state that the morning hour had expired?

The SPEAKER. It has expired, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] moves to proceed to the consideration of the business upon the Speaker's table.

CONTESTED ELECTION FROM PENNSYLVANIA—WRIGHT VS. FULLER.

Mr. ASHE. I move that the House proceed to the consideration of the contested-election case from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of the day, in the opinion of the Chair, is the consideration of that election case.

Mr. COBB. I give way.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move to postpone the regular order of the day until tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ASHE] took the floor upon his proposition?

Mr. ASHE. I did.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] could not take the floor from him to make a motion.

Mr. STEPHENS. I did not know that the gentleman [Mr. ASHE] claimed the floor, as he barely moved to take up the order of the day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman states that he did.

Mr. STEPHENS. If so, then of course I could not take the floor from him.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ASHE] will suspend his remarks for a moment, until the resolution offered by the Committee on Elections can be read.

The resolution was then read, as follows:

Resolved, That the election at the Danville precinct, county of Montour, eleventh Congressional district, in the State of Pennsylvania, was illegally and irregularly conducted, and the seat of the member from that district is vacant; and that the Speaker inform the Governor of that State of the decision of this House, that a new election may be ordered.

Mr. ASHE. Mr. Speaker, after several ineffectual attempts to obtain the attention of the House, for the consideration of this case, as I have succeeded now in doing so, I will promise the House to be as brief as possible in my statement of it.

I believe I may say, with perfect confidence, that I never undertook the examination of a case more determined in my own mind to be free from prejudice or improper bias, one way or the other, than I did in this case. And if, unfortunately, instead of being a unanimous report, there should have been two reports to the House, it does not indicate that these feelings did not govern, not only the chairman, but the other members of the committee, but it only shows the great facility with which men can view things in several different aspects.

The official returns made by the proper returning officer of the State of Pennsylvania, in accordance with their law upon the subject of elections, show six thousand two hundred and sixteen for Henry M. Fuller, and six thousand one hundred and fifty-seven votes for Hendrick B. Wright, thus giving the sitting member a majority of fifty-nine votes. The contestant, considering himself aggrieved by the mode and manner in which the election was conducted, did, according to the provisions of a law passed September, 1851, serve a notice on the sitting member [Mr. FULLER] of his intention to contest his seat.

In accordance with the notice served upon him, both parties proceeded to the examination of witnesses, and to the examination of evidence brought forward upon each side, touching the merits of the case.

The sitting member [Mr. FULLER] raised a preliminary objection before the committee, that the notice of the contestant was not sufficient to put him upon a defense of his rights, inasmuch as it was not in compliance with the letter of the law, passed by the previous Congress, regulating the manner of taking testimony in election cases. The majority of the committee overruled this objection. Their reasons I will state in a very few words.

The object of the law was, to give the sitting member a knowledge of the grounds upon which the contestant relied in the contest. The letter of the law, indeed, requires the contestant to give such notice, and the only point is, to determine whether the notice is sufficient to give that information. Now, my friend from the minority side of the committee says, very justly, that it is the duty of the party contestant to set forth the facts so plainly and particularly, as would, if proved, render it the duty of Congress either to vacate the election, or declare another person duly elected to office.

For the House to determine upon the merits of this preliminary objection, raised by the contestant, they should—adopting the information contained in the minority report, and sanctioned by the majority report—find out whether, in this notice, there is such a specification of facts as to justify this House in either setting aside the election and ordering a new one, or in awarding the seat to the contestant, to the exclusion of the sitting member. The majority of the committee, in order to put the House in full possession of this case, had the notice transcribed in full, and I will read certain specifications, and leave it to the House to determine whether they be not sufficient, if substantiated by proof, to require that the House adopt one or the other of the alternatives presented—either to vacate the seat, or to admit the contestant.

The notice was served in proper time. That is not disputed.

The first allegation is:

"That the election at the Danville borough poll, and the Mahoning poll, within the present county of Montour, and both within the said Congressional district, were irregularly and illegally conducted.

"First. In the reception of votes, by the officers of both election boards, from persons who were not, at the time, qualified electors within the meaning of the statutes of Pennsylvania—the said persons being, at the time, either under the age of twenty-one years, non-residents, foreigners not naturalized, or persons not regularly assessed or returned; neither of which classes of persons are, by the laws of Pennsylvania, entitled to the elective franchise, so as to be legally qualified to vote for a candidate for the office of member of the House of Representatives of the United States.

"Second. That the officers of the said Danville borough election board allowed and permitted persons to introduce and deposit ballots in the box for Representative aforesaid, who were not members nor officers of the said board."

Again:

"Fifth. That the ballots deposited in the box for Representative, as aforesaid, at the said Danville borough poll, do not correspond in number with the list of the names of voters, nor with the tally lists kept by the proper officers in conducting said election."

"Sixth. That at the said Danville borough poll, persons were permitted to vote for Representative aforesaid, whose names were not on the list of taxables furnished by the county commissioners, and that the reasons of such votes were not inserted by the inspectors of said election opposite the names of said voters in the said list, nor by the clerks of said election in the list of voters kept by them at such election."

"Seventh. That two of the officers of the said Danville borough poll were ineligible and not competent, according to law, to hold and conduct the said election."

And, finally, the contestant alleges and avers—

"That at the several polls above named and particularly specified, there were illegal votes enough polled and counted to have changed the result of the said election; and that if the said illegal votes had not been received and enumerated, the undersigned would have had a majority of all the votes cast in the said eleventh Congressional district for Representative as aforesaid; and that the several illegal acts committed by the said several election boards, together with the informalities of law thereto pertaining, are sufficient in law and fact to entitle the undersigned, contestant, to a seat in the thirty-second Congress, from the said eleventh Congressional district of Pennsylvania."

Now, Mr. Chairman, we have in this notice the direct charge made that the election was conducted in an illegal and irregular manner. We have another charge, that, in consequence of this illegal and irregular manner of conducting the elections, there were votes received not authorized by the laws of Pennsylvania regulating elections; and we have the general averment, that, in consequence of this illegal and irregular manner of receiving votes, a sufficient number of illegal votes were polled to change the result of the election.

If the proof should confirm and establish these specifications, it appears to me—though I may take a mistaken view of the case—that the House cannot, in justice to itself, and in support of the Pennsylvania election law, refuse to adopt the report of the committee.

Again, sir, as I intimated before, this law was intended to prevent any surprise being practiced upon the sitting member. In the minority report my friends do not complain of any surprise, or that the sitting member was taken unawares. On the contrary, he did appear at the different places, and through counsel, or in person, examine and cross-examine the different witnesses produced.

Then, if there was no surprise, and if he had a full opportunity to examine all the witnesses to destroy the force of these facts, of course it is with bad grace that he comes to this House and claims that the notice was not sufficient.

The objection is urged by the sitting member [Mr. FULLER] before the committee—and it is sanctioned by the minority report—that the notice did not contain the names of the illegal voters, and that it should have been particular in giving their names.

Now, if any gentleman will examine for a moment the system of elections by ballot, he will find that to be almost impossible; and if under some circumstances possible, I hesitate not to say that in this case it was impossible. From the evidence taken before the committee, and in fact from the argument of the contestant before the committee, which was confined entirely to the "Danville borough," a majority of the committee felt satisfied that a more specific compliance with the request of the sitting member was impossible. The law makes it the duty of the commissioner whom the contestant selects to take these depositions, to issue subpoenas. One hundred and eighty-six votes were polled at that borough, which the contestant alleges were illegal. He had subpoenas regularly served upon them. Almost to a man they refuse to appear. As elections are made by ballot in Pennsylvania, how could he find how they voted, if at all, unless by some examination before a United States commissioner? They refused to appear before the commissioner, in consequence of the great excitement pervading the community. Of the character of that community, on the present occasion, I will not speak. It would be useless.

Mr. BOCOCK. I desire to know how the contestant could come to the conclusion that a particular vote was illegal, unless he knew by whom that vote was given?

Mr. ASHE. He found there were so many votes on the poll list not on the assessors' list. By the laws of Pennsylvania, when a vote is polled, the name of the voter not appearing upon the assessors' list, the particular reason on account of which it is received is made a matter of record. The clerk of the election is required to enter the reason given, and there were recorded so many names as having voted, which did not appear upon the assessors' list.

Mr. BOCOCK. He might have stated those names which were not on the assessors' list.

Mr. ASHE. But there were reasons why a man should be entitled to vote whose names were not upon the assessors' list. The minority of the committee quote several precedents which they maintain show conclusively that it was necessary and proper the contestant should give the names of these voters. Now, sir, I do not look upon precedents of this House with regard to election cases as of great importance, yet I have examined the various precedents, cited by the minority, which, if I am not mistaken, I can demonstrate that so far from sustaining their allegation, they have directly an opposite tendency—that they show conclusively this House has seldom required the names of illegal voters to be given. The first they have cited is a Pennsylvania contested-election case—the case of Leland. That case never came to a final decision; but the decision, as obtained by me from Philadelphia, was merely an interlocutory one. The opinion of the court was, that the names of the illegal voters were not required to be given, but merely a statement of the fact, that they were illegal voters—why they were so, and their number. So, in that case it was decided the names could not and were not required to be given under the laws of Pennsylvania.

My friends, certainly, could not have examined the next case they cite as confirming their conclusion. In kindness, I must think they read only its caption. It is the case of Easton vs. John Scott, which identical case I had myself selected as showing the correctness of the position assumed by the majority—not merely overruling the preliminary objection of the sitting member, but also as authority in declaring the seat vacant. Since they have referred to the case, it should have binding effect upon the House. There is a striking and remarkable similarity between that and the present case, so far as the attending circumstances are concerned. My friends could not have perused the report accompanying that case, or they would have ascertained to their satisfaction that the House overruled the report of the committee which recommended a resolution that the contestant should give the sitting member particular notice, with the names of the illegal voters. They overruled the additional application on the part of the sitting member to retain his seat, and finally adopted a resolution declaring the seat vacant. As far as precedents showed, and bare influence in the House, the case referred to is directly against the minority, and support and maintain the position of the majority of the committee.

The case of Varnum is also cited. In that case the House did pass a resolution that the sitting member should be furnished with the names of the illegal voters; but that was not a case between a contesting and sitting member. A few electors made complaint of the illegality of the return of Mr. Varnum. The House required the particular specification quoted by my friends of the minority, but they also immediately afterwards dismissed the case finally, and exclusively upon the ground that it was a malicious prosecution.

The next case referred to is Little vs. Robbins, which was up for consideration two years ago. In this, I am inclined to think, my friends also are at a loss for proof of the correctness of their position. When I saw in their report that notice was given there by the Committee on Elections requiring the contestant in this case to give the names of the illegal voters, it struck me with surprise; for, though I served upon that committee, and about as attentively as I do to any other of my general duties, I had no recollection of any such notice having been given. I searched the records of the committee, kept by Judge Strong—a very particular man—but found no evidence of the resolution having been passed. I examined the reports of the two committees as made to this House, but found none there. To strengthen my impression, I inquired of several gentlemen who had served upon that committee with me, and they replied that they had no recollection of such a resolution having passed. The returned member, [Mr. ROBBINS,] now in my eye, also informed me that the notice did not require such particularity as the statement of names. I went further, to do the fullest justice to the case. I consulted Judge Strong, of Pennsylvania, the chairman of that committee, and he stated that the committee passed no such resolution. Gentlemen have not examined carefully the authorities they have cited. I have now only done it because of their being referred to in the minority report, and because I consider them to have received but little attention at their hands. They did not give them sufficient examination. I will remark here that, under all of the circumstances of the case, it was impossible for the contestant to have given this notice in the particular manner contended for. As I have said before, the witnesses summoned by the United States officer did not attend. A vast majority put the process at contemptuous defiance, and he never could avail himself of the advantage of their testimony bearing upon this case.

Mr. FULLER. I find by reference to the report of the Committee on Elections of the Thirty-first Congress, on the case of Little vs. Robbins—I will state in reply to the suggestion of the gentleman, the following answer of Mr. Littell, the contestant, to a resolution passed by that committee: "In compliance with the requisition of the resolution of the Committee on Elections, adopted the 11th of January, 1850, I have the honor to submit the following statement and specifications," &c. And that statement and those specifications contained the list of voters to which objection was made. This was required of Mr. Littell upon that occasion, and this is the evidence of the fact.

Mr. ASHE. I am glad the gentleman has made reference to it. Owing to my careless manner of speaking, I forgot to allude to it. I had intended to do so. The only evidence before me was this memorandum of Mr. Littell, the contestant, in which he states that, "in compliance with the requisitions of the resolution of the Committee on Elections, adopted the 11th of January, 1850, I have the honor to submit the following statement and specifications." He makes his statement and submits the names of the illegal voters of one precinct. Now I do not consider that—

Mr. FULLER. It was contended, as I understood, by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. ROBBINS,] who I do not now see in his seat, before that committee, when the case of Littell and Robbins first came before them, that the notice was not sufficiently full, that it did not put the party sufficiently upon his inquiry, and that, therefore, the committee by resolution required of Mr. Littell full and particular specifications. And in that full and particular specification required by the committee, he furnishes the list of voters to whom particular objections were made. Here is the list contained in the report, and I understood further from Mr. ROBBINS, who was the sitting member, that such was the object of that resolution. I understood so from him. Such at all events was the effect of the resolution and notice given by Mr. Littell. In answer to that resolution of the committee were given a list of the names.

Mr. ASHE. God knows that I do not wish to do the sitting member any injustice.

Mr. FULLER. I know that.

Mr. ASHE. In that case the contestant, in reply to the notice served upon him, makes a statement in compliance with the requisition of the resolution adopted on a certain day. It was the statement made by Mr. Littell, and contained in this report that put me upon inquiry, for it struck me with surprise, that the committee should have passed such a resolution without my recollecting it. From my examination of it and my knowledge of the individuals who composed the committee, and from a conversation I had with Mr. ROBBINS, I felt satisfied that Mr. Littell labored under a very great mistake, if he endeavored to produce the impression that such was the argument of the committee.

My friends of the minority on the committee were again unfortunate in attempting to justify, or rather to exculpate, these individuals who thus attempt to put at defiance the laws of the United States regulating the mode and manner of taking testimony in election cases. They tell us that the commissioner himself acted very improperly, and that justice would be better consulted, for such is the impression made, by disregarding his process than obeying it. I think my friends of the minority did not examine the evidence they are quoting. They refer to the case where the judge or commissioner took the evidence of a man who was beastly drunk, and after taking it, refused to record it as given in.

Now, without being an advocate of the character of either of these commissioners—without saying that either of them acted as judges should have done, in expelling from their hearts all partisan feelings in this case—my friends of the minority have done great injustice to that individual commissioner who, I am informed by his neighbors, is a man of high character. In justice to them, I wish only to say, that the witness called upon by the sitting member to prove the above facts, is a Mr. Montgomery, whose character is unimpeached, and he states, that the commissioner did refuse to record the evidence of a drunken man, and why? Because his testimony was incoherent irrelevant, and nonsensical. But again, if my friends had read the authority from which they are quoting, they would have found that the contestant objected to his examination. The judge determined to rule out his examination and not put it upon record. One of the counsel for the sitting member insisted that the witness should be examined, and that his testimony should be taken.

Mr. FULLER. I know the gentleman takes great pleasure in being corrected, and, therefore, I avail myself of his courtesy. He will remember that this witness of whom this complaint is made, was drunk when he was called upon the stand; that the commissioner permitted him to be sworn while in this state of beastly intoxication; and that after his examination had progressed some time, and he was disgracing the whole proceeding, it was objected to, and not till then, on the part of the contestant, and a desire expressed that it might be suspended until the witness became sober. In addition to the evidence of Mr. Montgomery upon this point, is the evidence of Mr. Charles Cook, who swears that the commissioner did not take down the testimony as it was delivered, it being manifestly his intention to put a sober witness on the notes, when there was a drunken witness on the stand.

Mr. ASHE. Although this is an irrelevant point, but in order to put myself right, and show the character of the testimony introduced, I will read the whole of it, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FULLER] will find that I have done the case full justice:

Mr. Montgomery called again:

Question. Were you present when John Ammerman was examined before Judge Jayne?

Answer. I was.

Q. Was he drunk or sober at the time of his examination?

A. He was evidently very much intoxicated.

Cross-examined.—Q. You would not call him beastly drunk, would you?

A. I would prefer using the expression which I have used with regard to him.

Q. Did he not appear to understand what he was about, or what he said?

A. He did not so appear to me.

Q. Was his evidence intelligible?

A. I thought his answers were incoherent; he made exclamations to the crowd during his examination; spoke of a jury being present; his testimony was not taken down by Judge Jayne, and read off here, as he delivered it.

Q. Did not Judge Jayne take down and read off all the testimony he gave, connected with the questions that were put to him?

A. Several of his incoherent and strange answers were not taken down by Judge Jayne, according to evidence, as read to him by Mr. Brisbane afterwards. Mr. Fuller's counsel insisted that the judge should put down a certain strange answer, and the judge refused to put it down, on the ground that it was silly.

Q. Did the judge use the word silly, or anything like it?

A. I am not certain that he used that word, but he certainly used one of the same import, silly or foolish, or something of that sort. I allude to some express answer to some question where the witness intimated that Mr. Fuller's counsel was intoxicated, and Mr. Casey insisted on its being put down, and Judge Jayne refused to do so.

Q. Was not the following what you allude to: Did not Mr. Casey ask the witness how many drinks he had had that day, and the witness replied, one since supper; Mr. Casey then said it must have been good liquor, to which the witness replied it was, and I guess by the looks of your face you have had some of the same kind?

A. The answer to which I allude was made in reply to an inquiry of Mr. Fuller's counsel as to the witness having taken liquor; I presume the question was properly taken down by Judge Jayne, but the answer I know was not.

Q. Was his testimony read by any one in the presence and hearing of Mr. Fuller and his counsel?

A. His testimony, as taken down by Judge Jayne, was read by Mr. Brisbane in presence of Mr. Fuller and his counsel, but it was not taken down by Judge Jayne in the way it was delivered. I would say further, that Colonel Wright asked the judge to suspend the examination of the witness in consequence of his intoxication, he was not fit to be examined; and that Mr. Casey objected, saying that if they would call a drunken witness, they must go on with him.

Q. Were you present most of the time that Judge Jayne was taking testimony here?

A. I was not; I was most of the time at the Bloomsburg court.

Q. When I read over the testimony, was any objection made to it as taken down?

A. I cannot say whether Mr. Casey entered his objection to the accuracy of it until after it was read by Mr. Brisbane.

J. G. MONTGOMERY.

May 13, 1851; Sworn to and subscribed before me,

JOHN COOPER, Commissioner.

Some of my friends in this House have occupied the judicial position, and they must know that a judge who would place any reliance upon the silly and incoherent testimony of a drunken witness, would do neither himself or the bench credit. On the contrary, the judge who respects himself will always reject it.

I think my friends of the minority certainly overlooked this testimony of Mr. Montgomery, the witness called by the sitting member, and whose character is above reproach, or they would not have made this wholesale charge against a man, who, I understand, at home occupies a high position. At the suggestion of the sitting member, I will read the testimony of Mr. Charles Cook:

Cross-examined.—Q. You mean, do you not, that Judge Jayne did not take down all he (Ammerman) said, while giving in his testimony?

A. I think he did not put down his full answers.

Q. Did he not take down all the witness said, having any relevancy to the question propounded?

A. I think not. In answer to a question where he got his tickets, he commenced answering, and the following words are omitted in the judge's notes, "now do not stop me, or I will forget my story;" afterwards the witness gave his answer, but not in the same words that the judge took down. I do not recollect the difference, but I noted it at the time.

This testimony does not vary the case in the least, and it shows that the witness was undoubtedly drunk, and illy fitted to give the committee or this House any reliable evidence.

Overruling this preliminary objection, the committee commenced their examination into the merits of the case, and in order to be understood properly, I will restate the positions which have been already stated. It strikes me, as it did a majority of the committee, if the House should be satisfied that there was such irregularity and illegality of conduct of the elective board in the reception of votes at that precinct, as stated and specified by the contestant, and if the consequences of that irregularity and illegality were, that a sufficient number of illegal votes were received to change the result of the election, this House, in justice to its own character, can come to but one decision, and that is, to send the case back to the people of the district, giving them to understand, that though we do not deprive them of representation, yet we insist upon their sending a man here who is returned in both a proper and legal manner.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is necessary for this House to be particularly informed of the election laws of Pennsylvania, in order to determine correctly this case, because, although this House is properly and constitutionally judges of the return of its own members, members of this House are returned under the laws, and by force of the election regulation of the different States. The laws of Pennsylvania are very stringent in prescribing the qualification of voters, and also very particular and stringent in surrounding the ballot-box with as many preventives against fraud as possible. The laws of Pennsylvania require that before any general election shall take place, that there shall be a preliminary election in each district of a judge and two inspectors. These two inspectors have the right each to appoint a clerk, and these two clerks, the two inspectors, and the judge constitute the election board. Now, what is the duty assigned to the judge? The judge is particularly required to be present on the day of the election, and to act strictly as umpire to decide when the inspectors may disagree respecting a vote. If the inspectors disagree respecting the propriety of receiving a vote, they are to appeal to the judge, whose duty is pointed out. He is to decide between them; and what else does the law say? In order to have this judge as free from prejudice, and as uncontaminated by the excitement of the day as possible, it particularly says he shall in no other manner interfere in the election.

The sixth section of the Pennsylvania consolidated election law, provides that the judge shall act as UMPIRE in the event of the disagreement of the inspectors—as to the right of an elector to vote—"but not otherwise." His whole duty consisting in the power to decide on the disagreement of the inspectors.

Now, sir, it is alleged and complained of by the contestant, that on this day the judge, Mr. Kitchen, not only neglected his own duties, but usurped the duties of an inspector, and that the inspector, whose duty it was to stand at the window, and to receive, was ousted from his position, and made merely distributor of votes. This may appear, at the first glance, as an immaterial matter; but the House will gather from this fact, fully established by the evidence, that it becomes a very serious and important matter. The duties of inspectors, are particularly described and set forth; and in order to make myself understood, I will read to the House what the Pennsylvania law requires of them, which is in substance as follows: "The inspectors shall receive and distribute the tickets." It is expressly made their duty to stand at the place where the tickets are handed up.

Now, the majority of the committee finding out that a large number of illegal votes had been received, or discovering, on comparing the result of this election with that of others held previously and subsequently to this, that there was a vast disparity in the number of electors, and as foreigners, whose papers had not been taken out, to the number of forty, or upwards, had been received—as non-residents had been received—the majority felt authorized to say, and to state in their report, that this change of position at the window by Judge Kitchen, and the driving from the window the inspector Mettler, was intended to cover and cloak a fraud. I generally, Mr. Speaker, judge a man from his actions. I know there are some other rules, but that old-fashioned rule is the best, in my estimation. I very seldom or ever found it fail. At any rate, if the judgment is adverse, it throws the onus probandi of good intent upon the party complained of.

In 1849, at the Danville poll, there were received 463 votes, and in 1851, 731—thus making a difference of 268 votes.

Mr. FULLER. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee, in this connection, if there was not evidence before the committee that in 1845, five years previous to this election, 750 votes were polled at the Danville district, and that during the interval of the five years more than five hundred dwelling-houses were erected in that district?

Mr. ASHE. With a great deal of pleasure I will answer the gentleman's question. I assure the gentleman I intended to mention this fact. Subsequently, though, the House must be informed, there was a division of the township—instead of being one precinct, there were two created. Hence there should have been a reduction of the number of votes in this precinct.

Mr. FULLER. In 1845, there were 750 votes polled in Danville district, and between 1845 and 1850 over 500 dwelling-houses were erected in that district. In 1850 the district was divided, and at the election of 1850, 858 votes were polled, so that the increase in the two districts was 127 in the one and 731 in the other. Therefore, the increase during the five years was but 108, with this immense increase of population.

Mr. ASHE. The gentleman states the fact, but, unfortunately, after 1845 there was a division of the township, and hence the reduction of the votes.

Mr. FULLER. The gentleman misunderstands me. The district was divided, but the two districts combined, polled but 858 votes in 1850. There is where the gentleman is mistaken. While five years before, the same district, then being one district, polled 750 votes; in 1850 polled 858 votes; and during the interval 500 dwelling-houses were erected.

Mr. ASHE. I do not misunderstand the gentleman at all. There was a division of the township, but it was not an equal but an unequal division in point of votes, and a vast majority re-remained in Danville proper. But I will leave that point, because the division of the township would naturally bring about a great subtraction of the votes since, whereas it is increased largely. How was it subsequent to that time? How many votes were polled in 1851, the year after the election contested? Why, 555 only at Danville precinct, being 176 less than the year before the contested election took place. So, whether my friend goes back before, or whether he comes down after, the evidence is fully against him.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have stated the fact, that this change of the position by the judge, when the law expressly said that he should not act but in one capacity, was intended to cover fraud. Let me see if the evidence does not substantiate and support me in that assertion. Now, what does Judge Kitchen himself say, when called by the sitting member, and put upon the stand, in answer to this question—

"Was or was not the election fairly and honestly conducted, and were or were not all the tickets for Congress that were received, fairly counted and fairly returned?" What is his answer? It is as follows:

"I could not swear whether all that came into the window were legal or not; they satisfied us that they were legal, or we would not have received the votes."

Now, sir, the House must bear in mind that he had changed his position. Instead of being a judge and umpire to decide upon contested votes, he stood at the window and received the votes, and thus disqualified himself for discharging the duties of a judge. He says:

"I will not swear that they were all legal votes that came into the window or not. I will only say, after they were received, as far as I know, they were legal."

Now, Mr. Speaker, you will recollect that Judge Kitchen himself is the person who has acted criminally in this matter, for it gives me much pleasure to say that I exonerate the sitting member from all participation in this fraud. It is the officer in charge of the election who is charged with fraud. He is charged with cheating the people of Pennsylvania of a legal and proper Representative in this House; he is placed on trial, and he is now called upon to acquit himself of the charge which would subject him to a criminal prosecution under the laws of Pennsylvania. How does he do it? By denying it? No, but by a tacit admission of the fact, with the simple assurance, that after the votes came into the window, they satisfied him that they were legal, and were not improperly disposed of. Let me read the next question:

"Was or was not the election fairly and honestly conducted?"

He answers:

"After the tickets came in it was all fairly and honestly conducted, as far as I know."

But again, sir, let us see what Mettler's declarations are? When Mettler, who appears to have some spark of honesty in his heart, is put upon the stand, and is asked this question—

"Did you not, as a member of that board, act fairly and honestly, and receive votes only from those persons entitled to vote?"

He answers:

"I received but a few votes from persons; I received them from the judge."

This is what Mettler himself says. A witness is called by the name of Thomas Lloyd, to prove the declarations of Mettler. He was asked—

"What was said by the officers of the special election, held at the same place, and by Mettler, there on that day, about their producing their papers?"

And he answers:

"I heard Mr. Mettler state that he had been an officer at the fall election, and now he was at the window himself; and that he was determined he would not let any person vote unless they had a right to vote, or something to that effect, as he said there had been men voting at the fall election who had no right to vote; and I heard him say that he had been tax collector for several years, and that he knew that they could not poll over five hundred legal votes in the borough no how; that I heard him say at different places on the day of election and afterwards."

But again, sir; here is the evidence of Mr. Reuben Schock, a witness for the contestant:

"What did you hear Thomas Mettler say, as to the frauds that were committed at the election in October last in this borough?"

Now, Mr. Speaker, recollect that these are the declarations made by a man who had a few sparks of honesty in his bosom—a few scruples about the manner in which his duty had been discharged. He answers to the preceding question thus:

"I heard him say he was an officer of the election, and that he was taking tickets in at the window; and that he had taken in three or half a dozen men's that voted, and then they put him away, and would not let him take in any more; then some one put the question to him, how they came to put him away? 'Well,' says he, 'because they wanted everybody to vote that came up to the window, and, by God, I would not let them.' Some one said something, I cannot remember exactly what, and Mettler said they wanted Fuller elected so damned bad that they let everybody vote that came up to the window. I have heard him say this over several times, but it was always the same thing."

I do not wish to be too severe in my expression of opinion against any man. I believe I have as much charity in my heart as most people; but when we find evidence produced before the committee, and before the House, that fixes so directly upon an election officer an acknowledged fraud, I ask, will this House sanction it, or will they say as I have before stated they should say to the people of Pennsylvania, "Take this case, and purge your own filthy stable?"

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FULLER. As I have interrupted the gentleman several times, I move that he be permitted to proceed with his argument. I hope he will have the general consent of the House to do so.

Mr. ASHE. I do not ask any such courtesy of the House.

Mr. FULLER. I ask it because I have interrupted the gentleman.

[Cries of "Let him go on!"]

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LETCHER. I object.

Mr. ASHE. I am much obliged to the gentleman, for it relieves me from a great deal of trouble, I assure you.

Mr. FULLER. Well, Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard upon this question, and I would prefer, if it is agreeable to the House, to speak to-morrow. I move that the further consideration of the report be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. ASHE. Will the House hear a suggestion from me upon this matter?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be pleased to do so, if the House will indulge the gentleman in making his suggestion.

[Cries of "Go on!" "Go on!"]

Mr. ASHE. I have received a communication which requires me to go home to-morrow, on urgent business, if I do not receive a different message; and therefore feel very anxious to get through with this case as soon as possible.

Mr. FULLER. No man is more anxious than I am.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman insist upon his motion?

Mr. FULLER. Perhaps some other gentleman would like to speak to-day; if so, I will withdraw the motion.

[Cries of "Go on yourself!"]

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman give way for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. FULLER. I will, sir.

Mr. FOWLER. Then I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CLEVELAND demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he is not obliged to speak to-day. We can go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. FOWLER. I withdraw the motion to adjourn, and move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield the floor for that purpose?

Mr. FULLER. I do.

The question was put upon Mr. FOWLER's motion, and, on a division, there were—ayes 55.

Mr. MARSHALL, of California, demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. Hous-ton and CHANDLER were appointed.

The question was again put, and the tellers reported—ayes 71, noes 39—no quorum voting.

Mr. HAMILTON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ALLISON. As there is no quorum present, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. That is the only motion that can be made, except a motion for a call of the House.

Mr. STUART. Is it not in order to ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of ascertaining if there is a quorum present?

The SPEAKER. The House having divided by tellers, and it being shown to the whole House that there is not a quorum present, the Chair decides that a motion to adjourn and a motion for a call of the House are the only motions in order.

Mr. STUART. I make this point: that until the Chair announces the result of the vote, the fact that there is a quorum, or that there is no quorum, is not ascertained; and that if there be a call for the yeas and nays in the mean time, it is in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announced the fact that there was no quorum.

Mr. MARSHALL, of California. I move that there be a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. A motion has been made to adjourn, which takes precedence.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

[Cries of "Oh, no!" and "Take tellers!"]

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. Very well, I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. VENABLE. I ask for tellers on the motion to adjourn.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MARSHALL, of California, and SAVAGE were appointed.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the negative—ayes 42, noes 75.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question recurred on the motion submitted by Mr. FOWLER, that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and being put, the motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. STUART in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated as the business before the committee, the consideration of House bill No. 207, "to supply deficiencies of appropriations for the services of the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1852," and that the gentleman from New York [Mr. HORSFORD] was entitled to the floor.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. HORSFORD delivered a speech in support of the bill heretofore reported, proposing the establishment of an Agricultural Bureau. He earnestly spoke in behalf of the farmers; pressed the importance of the subject, and showed the advantages which would result from the measure proposed. [His speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. ASHE stated that he would take the liberty, which had been accorded to others, of publishing some remarks which he had prepared. [Mr. A.'s speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. SNOW then submitted some remarks upon Mr. BENNETT's bill, "making grants of lands to aid in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes," which will be found in the Appendix.

Mr. WELLS next obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. SCHOONMAKER, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman (Mr. STUART) reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the deficiency appropriation bill, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

On motion by Mr. CARTER, the House then adjourned till to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

JOHN B. AMOS.

The PRESIDENT announced that there was an adverse report made by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads on the memorial of John B. Amos.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask the Senate to let that lie until I can look into it. I am inclined to think that the report is right; but the individual is a constituent of mine, and I should like to have an opportunity of examining it. I move to postpone its further consideration until Friday next.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN C. HAYS.

The adverse report of the Committee on Military Affairs, on the memorial of John C. Hays, was concurred in.

Mr. GWIN subsequently moved to reconsider the vote concurring in the report.

Mr. RUSK. I hope that vote will be reconsidered. The application of Colonel Hays was for services of a very laborious character, performed in mustering troops into service. Certain allowances are made at the Department to those who perform that duty, but they were too small in amount to remunerate him. His petition was for the pay of a colonel of cavalry. That much has been rejected by the committee; and if the reconsideration takes place, I am requested to ask that the papers be withdrawn, in order that Colonel Hays may carry them to the Department, and receive that allowance to which he is entitled under the rules of the Department.

The PRESIDENT. If such is the pleasure of the Senate, the Chair will consider the report as not agreed to. The proposition will then be to give the individual leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

Leave was granted.

THOMAS H. LEGGETT:

The PRESIDENT. The first bill on the Calendar is the bill for the relief of Thomas H. Leggett.

Mr. BORLAND. The Senator from Virginia, [Mr. Hunter,] as chairman of the Committee on Finance, has taken an interest in this bill, and discussed it at length. In consequence of his absence, I move that its further consideration be postponed until Friday next.

The motion was agreed to.

MARK AND RICHARD H. BEAN.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. President, I would present to the Senate a case that has been lying upon the table, upon a motion to reconsider, for some weeks. It is a bill for the relief of Mark Bean and Richard H. Bean, of Arkansas. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, a motion to reconsider that vote was made, and that motion was laid upon the table. I should have called it up before, but for the fact, that this is the first Friday when private bills, which give rise to discussion, could be taken up. I move that the Senate now take up that bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; a motion was made to reconsider that vote, and the question now pending is upon the motion to reconsider.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That brings up, I suppose, the merits of the bill. I will state to the Senate, if they will be kind enough to give me their attention, as briefly as I can, the reasons why I think the reconsideration ought to take place. I was present at the time the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, but my mind was not directed to the subject, and although I opposed the bill in committee, I allowed it to pass to its engrossment without making my objections known, and did not know at the time that it was ordered to be engrossed. Hence I made the motion to reconsider.

The facts of the case, according to the papers, are these: These Messrs. Bean, as far back, I think, as the year 1817, discovered a saline on the Arkansas river, then in the Indian country. The highest fort upon the Arkansas river at that time was Fort Smith, which was some twenty, thirty, forty, or fifty miles below this salt well or saline. Major Bradford was commander at this fort. After the discovery of this saline by the Messrs. Bean, they wanted to make salt there, and they did make salt at this lick or saline, and carried about a hundred salt kettles in boats up the Arkansas river to the place where the salt was made. Afterwards the Government set apart the country which included the salt well, for the Indians who are now settled on the western boundary of Arkansas, and on setting apart the country west of the Arkansas for the Indian tribes, all the white settlers were directed to leave the country, so that the Indians might occupy it. The Messrs. Bean, of course, like the other white settlers in that region, had to leave the country. I think they were required to leave it in 1828. If I am wrong in that, my friend from Arkansas can correct me.

Mr. BORLAND. Eighteen hundred and twenty-eight was the year.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Messrs. Bean commenced their salt works after the discovery of the well in 1822 or perhaps 1821; I believe it was in 1821; so that they had possession of the salt works, and used and occupied the country, from 1821 up to 1828, when they were directed to leave. Congress, by an act for the purpose of compensating those persons who were directed thus to leave that country, gave each of them three hundred and twenty acres of land. They had made some little improvements in the country. They were permitted to go in under some treaties made with the Indians, I think in 1826. Prior to 1826 settlers were not permitted to go to the country; but in 1826, if I mistake not the date, after the treaties had been made, the country was thrown open for white settlers to emigrate and settle upon. These settlers were directed to leave the country in 1828. Subsequently, Congress passed an act giving each of them three hundred and twenty acres of land in order to pay them for their improvements which they had made. The Messrs. Bean had been there from 1821. They had entered the country long before it was open to white settlers. They had made their establishment and were manufacturing salt years before the country was open to white settlement, and before whites were permitted to go there.

It then becomes a question, how did the Messrs. Bean go into this Indian country? How did they commence their operations in salt? And here there is some little difference between the report made by the committee and myself in regard to the evidence. The report states that the Messrs. Bean were invited, as it were, to go to the country, by Major Bradford, who then had command of Fort Smith, the nearest post to the place where this salt well or saline was situated. I think the evidence does not authorize the statement in the report, that the Messrs. Bean were invited to go to the country by Major Bradford, or that Major Bradford held out any promise to them that if they would go he would protect them. I will read to the Senate what the only witness in the case, who ever had a conversation with Major Bradford, says. I refer to the deposition or statement of General Arbuckle. General Arbuckle states that he understood from Major Bradford, the commanding officer, that the Messrs. Bean had been permitted to establish salt works, as there was a great scarcity of salt upon the frontier. The construction of the statement of General Arbuckle will settle the point between the report and myself. I would like to have that portion of the report read. I will read the exact words of Major Arbuckle's statement: "I understood from Major Bradford, the commanding officer, that you [meaning the Beans] had been permitted to establish your salt works, as there was then a 'great scarcity of salt on the frontier.' I think the report, when it is read, will be found to contain a statement that the Beans established their salt works after being urged by the solicitation of Major Bradford to engage in the manufacture of salt for the supply of the troops of the fort, and after his making a promise to them that in case they should do so their rights should be fully protected and secured by the Government, of all of which there is no sufficient proof."

Mr. BORLAND. If the Senator will permit me to say a word, perhaps I can save him and the Senate some time. The Senator makes his point, as I understand, on the difference between an invitation to the Messrs. Bean to go on this land, and establish salt works, and a permission to them to do so. I understand that to be the point which he makes. I will say to the Senator that I am willing to concede the difference which he claims, and admit that this was merely a permission. I do not think, however, that it materially varies the question. We know that at that time no white person could go into that country without permission. General Arbuckle himself states that they were permitted to go. Now, it makes very little difference—no difference practically and substantially—whether they got that permission by their own solicitation, or whether they followed the solicitation of the United States officers, that they would go there. The object was the same: the Beans desired to make money for themselves; the officers of the Government desired that the salt works should be established for the benefit of the army and the country adjacent thereto. Believing that it would be a public benefit, the officers of the army granted the permission. Believing that they themselves would derive pecuniary benefit from it, the Messrs. Bean got the permission. Whether it was by their own solicitation, or on the solicitation of the officers of the army, I submit, makes no difference. If that is the only point which the Senator makes in opposition to the claim, I concede it to him; and that I think will save an argument.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am very glad of the concession, because it will supersede the necessity of my attempting to show that the testimony does not exactly warrant the statement of the report. Now, my friend thinks that the grant of a mere permission amounts to the same thing as an invitation and a guarantee that the Government would furnish protection. I think there is a great difference between them. In the way that the fact is conceded now it is this: The Messrs. Bean, exploring a wilderness country, found a saline upon Indian territory. They say to themselves, "We can manufacture salt here to our advantage;" and they then go to the commander of the post, whose duty it is to keep intruders off the Indian lands, and they say to the commander, "If you will not drive us away; if you will allow us freedom to remain here, we will establish our salt works." And the commandant says, "Very well; if you can get permission from the Indians you have my assent." That is a very different thing from telling them, "Go there; put up your salt works; go to work, and I will pledge to you the protection of the Government for your property, and the guarantee on the part of the Government for all the improvements you may erect there." Then, sir, take it that Major Bradford assented, after these people had discovered the saline, that they might go there and go to work, and make whatever they could, and he would not drive them away, because his men wanted salt. They then go on and make salt from 1821 to 1828—for seven years—when the country is set apart for the use of the Indians, and then they give up their works.

The compensation which these parties claim, is for the loss of the works, and the improvements which they made in reference to the manufacture of salt; and the committee have proposed an allowance to them of $15,000 for the loss of kettles and for their improvements. I say that the Messrs. Bean risked all this. It was Indian country at the time they went there. It was, I admit, subsequently purchased by treaty; and after it was purchased, it was thrown open to the immigration of the whites. But when it was set apart for the benefit of the Indians, the Government paid, as I have said, such compensation as it thought the settlers were entitled to. But before all this, it will be perceived, the Messrs. Bean intruded, and commenced making their salt upon the Indian country—the officers of the Government merely saying to them: "We will not drive you away." Now, I say that the Messrs. Bean risked the consequences. The Government came under no guarantee to them; the Government made no contract with them. The officers of the Government pledged the Government for nothing; and therefore we are not responsible to pay them. But if the Government is responsible, for how much is it responsible? That is the question.

In the first place, upon the facts which I have stated, the Government is not responsible for anything. But, suppose the Government to be responsible, then another question arises as to how much the Government is responsible for. If you will look at the testimony in this case, I think it will be made perfectly manifest that the witnesses make a valuation of what this whole property would have been worth if the Messrs. Bean could have been permitted to retain it—the lands, improvements, salt works, and all, including the value which the salt well would impart to the property. If you will look at the testimony, I think you will find that the witnesses estimate the whole value of the property to the Messrs. Bean, provided they could have retained the whole of it, and it could have been secured to them. Therefore they speak in this way: "We estimate the loss of Messrs. Bean at $15,000 or $20,000." They thus speak of the whole property, and some of them go so far as to say that while the Beans were manufacturing salt, the Indians, in passing to and fro through the country, were in the habit of seizing their stock, committing depredations upon their farms, and a great many trespasses, by which they sustained loss. Some witnesses say they estimate all that and the value, and make out the whole loss to be $15,000 or $20,000. Now, I want to show what the manager of this salt well swears to. If he tells the truth, it is perfectly evident that these people have been compensated double and treble for any expenditure which they may have made in the erection of these salt works. The manager, who says that he superintended the salt works from their commencement down to their termination when the Beans had to give up the property, swears that they made about thirty-five bushels of salt per day; that the expense of making the salt was about twenty-five cents per bushel; and that the salt was sold for a dollar a bushel—and of course the profit was seventy-five cents per bushel.

They were manufacturing salt there for seven years. If the statement which the manager makes be true, they made ten thousand nine hundred and twenty bushels per year. In seven years, then, they must have made seventy-six thousand four hundred and forty bushels. At twenty-five cents per bushel, which, he says, was the cost of manufacturing, the expense would have been $19,110, which would leave a clear profit of $57,330 for the seven years. Now, if that is not enough profit for the one hundred kettles carried out and put up in that Indian territory, I do not know what would be. This is the statement which the manager makes. The testimony of the manager was relied upon to prove the value of the property, no doubt under the idea that the value of the property was to be assessed, and that this productiveness of it would show its high value, and under the idea that the Government was to pay the full value, and that $15,000 or $20,000 would be allowed. But in proving the property to be so valuable, it is perfectly manifest that the profit was very great.

These kettles were only carried up once, though they were used for seven years. What would be the value of a salt kettle, after being used for seven years, my information does not allow me to state certainly; but I think I have knowledge enough to say that it would be but small. They speak, to be sure, of some expense and some difficulty in getting the kettles up, because, they say, they had to be carried in barges, they then having no steam power to help them up the river. I have not gone into a minute calculation to show what would be the expense of carrying these one hundred kettles, some in barges, and some in wagons across the plains; nor do I know precisely what they would be worth after they had been in use for seven years. But I do say, that if the manager, who swears that he was there from the commencement to the end, was correct in his statement; if they sold the salt, as he says they did, at a dollar a bushel, while the cost of manufacture was only twenty-five cents a bushel, and if they made the quantity which he says they did make, it is manifest that in these seven years they made more than $50,000 by it. These are the facts, according to my examination of the testimony; and I have gone through the whole of it, and taken extracts from every deposition and from every statement.

It is said that these people had two farms which they cleared and fenced while they were operating there. It did not cost them much to clear the ground, because all the wood which they took from the ground was necessary in boiling the salt. The laps of trees cut down for rails could be beneficially used for purposes of that kind. The expense of clearing was a necessary operation to supply the salt works with wood. The making of rails and fencing the ground was perhaps all the labor, the balance of the wood being used in the salt works. They have received already, under the act of Congress, three hundred and twenty acres of land for that. If they were entitled, because they were two partners, to have three hundred and twenty acres each, why, the committee ought to have reported in favor of giving three hundred and twenty acres more, and then they would have fared like everybody else; but instead of giving them the three hundred and twenty acres each for the two farms which they had, the committee propose to give them nothing for the additional farm, but to pay them $15,000 in money, under the idea that they have lost that amount, so as to make the Government liable. In that aspect of it, as a money claim, it ought to have been referred to the Committee on Claims, and they should have acted upon it; but regarding it as a land claim, the Committee on Public Lands ought to have given Messrs. Bean, as partners, for their two farms, three hundred and twenty acres, they having already received three hundred and twenty acres for one farm.

This, to my mind, is the whole of this case. If the Government on this state of the facts can pay the $15,000, very well. It seems to me to be unjust. It seems to me, that the parties have been fully compensated; and that they ran the risk of this compensation by the use of the saline for the seven years, for which they had the use of it. They asked permission thus to use it. The officers of the Government did not interpose to say "no," and they were compelled to surrender the possession of the country when it was wanted in 1828.

But I think they have already been sufficiently compensated.

Mr. BURLAND. Mr. President, if, as the Senator from Kentucky says, what he has presented, are the facts, and all the facts in the case, probably the Senate will come to the same conclusion to which he has come, that this claim ought not to be allowed; but while I know that he has stated only what he believes to be the facts—and to the extent to which he has gone, he has stated some of the facts—there are other facts to be stated, and another view to be presented in regard to the connection of the facts which are to be considered, and which will present the matter in a different light. I trust I am as little in the habit, as that Senator, or any one else, of advocating or favoring claims against the Government which are not well founded. I am generally considered, I believe, a little too stringent, and to go too far on the other side. But this case has seemed to me, from the first, to be so plain a claim, and so well founded, that it has really astonished me, when I have seen a gentleman so noted as the Senator from Kentucky is, for his exact habits of investigation, and knowledge of the facts, going so far in opposition to what I consider to be the facts in this case.

The Senator from Kentucky drew a distinction between an invitation from the officers of the army to the Messrs. Bean to go upon this land, and the permission to do so. As I stated a little while ago, I think substantially and practically they amount to the same thing. Why, if the officers of the army had sent a thousand miles by express to these gentlemen to come and perform this service, the very terms under which they would have gone on the land would have been merely a permission; and because General Arbuckle, in his affidavit, states, what is the fact, that they went on "by permission of Major Bradford," amounts to no more, as a fact, than that they went there by authority, and not as trespassers on the land of the Indians, or as trespassers on the land of the Government, not that they were there wrongfully, but were entitled, as American citizens, to exercise fully and freely the right to acquire property by their labor, as also protection in the enjoyment of that property.

I admit that if they had gone there without permission, they would not only have been subject to removal by the officers of the army, but would have had no right to claim compensation for the loss of their property. Going there, however, by permission of lawful authority, they stood on the same footing as any other American citizens, whether in that country or in any other country under the jurisdiction of the United States, having a right to acquire property and claiming protection in the enjoyment of that property, and holding the United States and all other persons at defiance when the property which they had lawfully acquired was to be taken from them. If the Senator from Kentucky had read the memorial of these gentlemen, and the affidavit of the officers of the army, and other persons, he would have seen that they not only went to this saline by the permission of the officers of the army, but that their going there was to render a benefit not only to the army in that section of the country, but to all the white people occupying that region.

The report of the committee has been before the Senate so long, having been here two years ago, that I do not deem it necessary to read it, or to recapitulate all the facts which it contains and sets forth, supposing it has been upon the tables of Senators, and that they have made themselves to some extent acquainted with it. But, briefly, these are the facts as the report of the committee sets forth, and as the statements of the officers of the United States Army, and other respectable persons, made under oath, sustain.

In 1817 these gentlemen, as the Senator from Kentucky has said, did discover this salt spring, and they did desire to make salt there; and from a conference with an officer of the army, Major Bradford, then commanding on that frontier, it was agreed between them that it would be for their mutual benefit, and the benefit of the country; otherwise the officer would not have dared to allow them to go there. The gentlemen did themselves believe that they would make money, and they did commence at very great expense, and perhaps under difficulties of more extraordinary hardships than any men, who have ever pushed forward into the wilderness and become pioneers of civilization, have ever encountered. It is said by those who know the facts, that it is doubtful whether any other men in the western country could have accomplished what they did accomplish. They are known to be of that old stock known to many in Tennessee to have pushed far in advance of civilization into the wilderness, and established that well-known point, so useful to the white settlements afterwards, known as "Bean's Station."

Inheriting the spirit of their father, they pushed still further on. They went into the western woods of Arkansas, and entered the country, then a wilderness, on the Illinois river. After discovering this saline spring, and completing their arrangements with the commanding officer at the nearest fort, they returned to the State of Tennessee, and procured their salt kettles, and all the apparatus necessary for the manufacture of salt, and carried them down the Cumberland, the Ohio, and the Mississippi, and up the Arkansas rivers, and then from sixty to a hundred miles—not in wagons, as the Senator from Kentucky stated—across the wilderness.

The Senator from Kentucky speaks of the value of a single salt kettle after it has been in use for seven years. The Senator knows that there was a large number of these kettles, together with the fixtures necessary to use them, which cost large sums of money, to say nothing of the losses sustained, the hardships encountered, and the exposure of life and property arising from the fact of their being on the borders of two hostile tribes of Indians then at war with each other.

But, sir, all this applies to their being in this country, as the Senator from Kentucky says, with the permission of the officers of the Government, up to 1826. As the advocate of this bill, and the claim of those gentlemen, I might throw all that aside. I might not ask for the least attention to be bestowed on all the hardships they endured, and all the expense which they incurred up to 1826, because, at that time, the country was open to white settlers, and every one who went there prior to the treaty with the Cherokees, that is, between the years 1826 and 1828, acquired all the rights of citizenship, the right to acquire property, and they cannot be deprived of that property without the Government becoming responsible to them for it. Now, the Senator from Kentucky will not say that they were not there from the year 1826 to the year 1828. He knows that they were there by lawful authority, and without the necessity of any permission, either from Major Bradford or anybody else. The simple question is, "Did they acquire a right of property after the year 1826?" It is in proof here, that they were in possession of this property, and that it was valuable. It is proved by officers of the Army of the United States, and by others, that they were in possession of property worth $30,000, and all concur in agreeing that it could not be worth less than $15,000. That, then, was their situation between 1826 and 1828. Up to 1826, as they state in their affidavit, and as may be inferred from all the statements of all the officers and witnesses, they had made no money on their investment. The hardships and difficulties they had encountered, and the losses they had sustained, had been sufficient to counterbalance all the money they had received from the sale of their salt.

But after 1826, as these persons had anticipated, (and that was the consideration which had induced them to go there and make the improvements and establish the salt works,) they did begin to make money, because the white people poured into the country, and a very large demand was made for the salt; so that they made up, in part, for the losses they had previously sustained from the depredations of the Indians. They were then free from their former difficulties, and made their salt in peace, and realized a profit for their expenditures. But just as they began to do so, and to receive some compensation for all their hardships (and all their expenses, the United States Government made a treaty with the Cherokee Indians in 1828, by which every white person was required to remove from the country forthwith, and, consequently, the whole country came into the possession of the Indians. There were no persons in that whole country who had any property, except Mark and Richard H. Bean. The others were mere squatters on a few acres, and there is no evidence to show that any other persons had any considerable property. They were all required, however, forthwith to abandon their property and the country, and remove back into the State of Arkansas. They did so, and the Indians entered upon the possession of their valuable property, and they have it now. And there, too, are the salt Kettles—whether they were worth much or little after seven years' use—still used by the Indians. These Indians now enjoy all the property and all the improvements made by Mark and Richard H. Bean, and the possession of that property constituted no small part of the consideration on account of which the Indians abandoned their country in Arkansas, and accepted of the territory granted to them on the west of the State, because they acquired a most valuable property, while that which they abandoned was worth little to them in Arkansas, as they were then situated.

Now, as to their legal claim for indemnity for their losses, the very act of Congress which passed subsequent to the treaty of 1828, recognizes and establishes the claim of all persons occupying lands in that country to remuneration for their property. That act gave to each of the settlers three hundred and twenty acres of land in exchange for the land that he abandoned. It was accepted, and considered a fair compensation to all the other settlers. Not so, however, with the Messrs. Bean. The other settlers were persons who had settled, perhaps, on a forty acre, or eighty acre lot, or, perhaps, on a quarter section, with a little cabin erected on it, and all the improvements which they had made respectively would not, probably, exceed $200 or $300 in value. On the contrary, these gentlemen had a large establishment, which, in the estimation of some of the witnesses, was worth $30,000. All concurred in representing it to be worth $15,000, at least. If, then, the Government undertook to compensate settlers there by granting them land for the other property which was taken away from them, it recognized the right of all the settlers to claim compensation from the Government; and when it is proved that these gentlemen, by their labor, and the investment, had accumulated property worth $15,000, I ask what obstruction is there in the way of granting them compensation? We have recognized the right by paying, in part; and they come forward and prove that their losses were much larger than they had been paid for, and request payment of the difference. If they had no right to any compensation, why pay any portion of the losses? You cannot drive them from their property without remunerating them for it, and you have exhibited a disposition to do so; but you made an error in estimating the value of the property, and made a grant of three hundred and twenty acres of land as remuneration for what they prove, beyond dispute, to have been worth $15,000, and what some have estimated as being worth $30,000.

The value of the property may well be inferred, as the Senator from Kentucky supposes, from the statement of the overseer of the works; but that statement does not warrant the inference which the Senator seemed disposed to draw from it, that it proved the amount of profits derivable from the work from its commencement up to the time when it was abandoned, but solely what the profits were after all obstructions were removed out of the way, and when they had a fair field for their labor. They would then have made money, and had, at that time, commenced to make money, as they manufactured thirty-five bushels of salt per day, and sold it at a dollar a bushel, while the manual labor employed cost only twenty-five cents per bushel. But in all the time previous to 1826, they not only had to pay the twenty-five cents per bushel, but also to protect themselves from the depredations of the Indians; from that cause they frequently lost all their stock, rendering it necessary to suspend all operations for weeks, while engaged in recovering it. The statement of the overseer proves the value of the property after that time; it proves that thirty-five bushels per day were then manufactured, that it was valued at a dollar a bushel, and cost the Messrs. Bean only twenty-five cents in the preparation.

I might say a great deal more on this subject, but I have stated the facts, substantially, and am unwilling to occupy the time of the Senate any longer. Unless the Senator from Kentucky desires to prolong the discussion, I am willing to allow the decision to be taken now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will make one or two remarks in reply to my friend from Arkansas; but I will be very brief. The point between the Senator from Arkansas and myself, and the argument which both of us have made, reduces this whole matter to a nut-shell. I agree with him, that if we are bound to pay the full value of the three hundred and twenty acres of land containing this salt well, that $15,000 is not too much according to the testimony we have on the subject. But I take issue with him just at that point. If we are bound to pay the full value of the land, and the improvements upon it, with this salt well included, I think it is worth $15,000; but I deny that we are bound to do any such thing, according to his own argument. Here are the facts about which we do not differ: These gentlemen discover a saline, and they obtain permission from the Indians, as well as from Major Bradford, to improve it. But that improvement is the improvement of the property of other people; it is improving the property of the Indians; it is improving the property of the United States. Well, when the Indians and the United States ultimately determine that they will not sell this property, or let these improvers have it; and when they say, that for the little improvements we will give you a tract of three hundred and twenty acres of land, I ask, are we to pay for the value of the saline which has been discovered upon that land, and upon which land some small clearings and some improvements have been made in the way of erecting sheds, &c.? The error of my friend from Arkansas is just this: That after these gentlemen discovered this saline, and built their sheds to put up their kettles, he thinks that gives them a right to the property, and makes it individual property; and then when you take it away, he thinks you ought to pay the whole value for the fee simple. Now, I say, if you have to pay the value of the fee simple, $15,000 is little enough; but the error is in regarding these persons as the owners of the fee simple. They never had it. They settled on the land, the usufruct of which was in the Indians, and the ultimate domain of which was in the United States; and when the Indian title was extinguished, the United States never did let them have the fee simple. Now, my friend from Arkansas calls upon us to pay for what they never had, the fee simple. If that is the true ground, and we are bound to pay for the fee simple, $15,000 is little enough. But I deny that we are bound to pay for property that never belonged to these people, and the use of which was conceded to them by the Indians and the United States. That is all. If we are bound to make any compensation for improvements—and the Government seems to have recognized the principle of making compensation for improvements after 1826—it would be simply for those improvements which were put there between 1826 and 1838. The Government has acted as though there was some obligation to compensate for improvements which the Government had invited them to make, and afterwards told them to abandon. It was done in the case of the other settlers there, and of the Messrs. Bean also. They accepted the land which the Government gave them for the improvements they had made under the invitation of the Government, and which they were required to surrender.

But how should that make the Government liable for improvements made before 1826, which were commenced in 1821, and which were used by these people by the mere permission of the Indians and of the United States, and for the sole benefit of the persons who made the improvements? If you have to pay at all, you must pay for all the improvements, the sheds, the kettles, the clearing of the land, and the value of the log cabins, for I think the testimony in the case speaks of two cabins. But my friend's claim does not go to that extent and stop there; he goes beyond that, and claims pay for the fee-simple in all this land. I will yield, if that is the sense of the Senate. I think the $15,000 is little enough, if that is the proper claim.

Mr. BADGER. Let us try the sense of the Senate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes, one word, and I will be glad to try the sense of the Senate. Why has this claim been postponed for twenty years? Government has settled all matters relating to all other claims for land in that territory. Major Bradford is in his grave, and cannot tell us anything about it. Then why is this claim brought forward now, when the officer who is said to have given these persons permission to occupy the land has been gone to his long home more than twenty years, and we cannot get at the evidence on that point? It does seem to me as if this claim ought not to be granted.

Mr. HALE. It does not seem that we are likely to get rid of these kettles, or of the Beans either, to-day, and I therefore move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BADGER. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion, for this reason: if we adjourn, we shall have the same thing over again next Friday, and so on, die ad diem, until the end of the session.

Mr. HALE. If we could get rid of it before the die ad diem, I would withdraw it, but I see that we cannot. I see that my friend from Arkansas wishes to say another word, and I know that my friend from Kentucky will not permit it to go without a reply. I therefore think we had better adjourn.

Mr. BORLAND. I hope the Senator will withdraw the motion.

Mr. HALE. I withdraw it.

Mr. BORLAND. I have no speech to make, but I merely wish to read a short letter, which I think will answer the last speech of the Senator from Kentucky, upon the question of the right of these persons to occupy the land which they did, and will show the circumstances under which they were there at the time the treaty was made. It is as follows:

GENERAL LAND OFFICE, April 27, 1852.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 27th ultimo, enclosing a report of the Committee on Public Lands, of the Senate, on the petition of Mark and Richard H. Bean, claiming indemnity for the loss of their improvement and salt works, near the junction of the Illinois and Arkansas rivers, which were embraced within the country ceded to the Cherokees by the treaty of 23d May, 1828; and requesting to be advised how and when the tract of country including their settlements was acquired by the United States, under what laws its occupancy was regulated until 1826, and how it was then thrown open to settlement by the white people?

In answer, I have the honor to state: That this land was first purchased by the treaty concluded September 25, 1818, with the Great and Little Osages; and subsequently by the treaty concluded with the same Indians, on the 2d of June, 1825, by which the Indian title to the lands between the Arkansas and Kansas rivers, west of the present boundaries of Missouri and Arkansas, was extinguished. Prior to those treaties its occupancy was regulated by the laws regulating the trade and intercourse with Indian tribes. Long prior to this last mentioned session, the Government had adopted the system of encouraging the settlement of the public lands by granting preemption rights to those who should settle on and improve them.

The fifth section of the act of April 12, 1814, (Laws and Instructions, part I., p. 244,) was considered applicable to the whole of the lands in the then Territories of Arkansas and Missouri; but afterwards was held to apply only to lands therein to which the Indian title had been extinguished.

The former construction will appear by reference to the act of 26th May, 1824, (same volume, p. 339,) by which a preemption right to a quarter section of land was granted to every person who was entitled, under the act of 1814, to a right of preemption to any land in that part of Arkansas, and ceded to the Cherokees by the treaty of 1817, and which is a part of the country now under consideration. It was held, however, by the Attorney General, that a preemption could not attach to any land occupied by Indians at the passage of the law granting preemptions.

[It does not apply to this. This was land that had been obtained from the Indians before that time.]

The whole of this country, however, was thrown open to settlement under the general policy of the Government by the promulgation of the treaty of 1825 aforesaid; and although not subject to the operations of the act of 1814 in view of the opinion of the Attorney General aforesaid, because at the passage of that law the lands were in possession of the Osages, yet those lands would have been subject to the operations of the act of 29th May, 1830, if they had not previously been granted to the Cherokees.

I have not been able, after the most diligent search and inquiry, to learn how this region obtained the name of the "Lovely Purchase."

With great respect, your obedient servant,

J. BUTTERFIELD, Commissioner.

HON. SOLON BORLAND,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. BAYARD. I desire to ask a question of the Senator from Arkansas in reference to this matter. It appears, from the statement of the petitioners, that other persons were excluded from the tract known as the "Lovely Purchase" up to 1826. If that were so, they must have gone there in violation of the laws of the United States; and I do not know of any authority which Major Bradford possessed to authorize them to make a settlement on the land of the United States which other persons were not authorized to settle upon. I believe their own petition states that that was the state of the case?

Mr. BORLAND. In answer to the Senator from Delaware, I would state, that up to 1826, under the laws regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, persons were excluded from that country; but therein consists, as I have undertaken to show, and as I think the papers show, the merits of this claim. The settlement made by the Beans was not merely by permission, but the public interests which were intrusted to the commanding officer there seemed to him to have required that they should have permission and encouragement to go there to make a settlement for the public interest. He had authority either to exclude them or permit them to go. He did not consider others fit persons to go, but permitted these men and encouraged them to go, because they were going to make an establishment of great public utility. In 1826 the country was, as the Commissioner of the General Land Office shows, thrown open to white settlers generally, and a vast number of other persons then went in.

Mr. BAYARD. I understand the state of the facts to be this: These parties allege that Major Bradford, an officer in the service of the United States, encouraged them to make a settlement on this salt spring land, which they discovered in 1817, and assured them of the protection of the Government; and that it was at his solicitation the works were established. They were illegally established regarding the laws of the United States. I am not aware that the commanding officer had authority to grant permission to establish the works there, though it might be that he did not choose to exercise the power of removing them. I am not aware of any legal authority which he had to grant the right. But my difficulty on this branch of the case is, that Congress, after the land was thrown open in 1826, when settlers came upon it, on public considerations, in May, 1828, having ceded the land to the Cherokees, compelled the white settlers to remove, and passed an act making compensation to those who were removed in consequence of this cession. At that time, as far as the statements appear, though they are somewhat indefinite, Major Bradford was alive. From 1828 to 1850 these parties sleep upon their claim. They make no demand upon the United States. Their allegation, and the sole foundation upon which the claim, in my judgment, can rest in equity, is, that they went there by invitation of Major Bradford, with assurances of protection, and with the view to supply salt to the troops that were located there. There is a defect of proof here, because there is no testimony whatever. The statement of General Arbuckle is, that Major Bradford permitted them to remain. The parties might, if they had had this claim founded upon the assurances of protection from Major Bradford, certainly not only might, but would, rationally speaking, have presented their claim in 1828, at the time when Congress passed the law allowing compensation to settlers on the land there. They did not do so. They have not accounted in any way why, from 1828 to 1850, they slept upon their rights; and now when those who were cognizant of facts material to the claim for their relief are in their graves, they come forward, and upon their own naked assertion as to that which forms the foundation of their claim in equity, ask for relief. I cannot vote for the bill without further testimony on that point.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I am unwilling that the Senate should decide upon the question of reconsidering the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, without adding my testimony in favor of the general principle involved in the bill. As to the amount of the compensation which the Beans claim, I am unable, for the want of that particular information of which my colleague is possessed, to state what is the amount of indemnity which they ought, in justice, to receive from the Government of the United States. But the shortest recapitulation of the facts will show that they are entitled to indemnity beyond question. How much that should be depends on the proof of which, as I said before, I am not sufficiently advised to state with particularity to the Senate. In 1818, the Beans undertook what was one of the most extraordinary enterprises of that day—one which required an unusual amount of energy, of labor, and of expense. From the place where the kettles for their manufactory were constructed, on the Cumberland river in Tennessee, to the place where their establishment was located, was almost an unbroken and unsettled wilderness of fifteen hundred miles. They were drawn by the Cumberland, and down the Mississippi, and then seven hundred miles up the Arkansas river. It was almost an unbroken, and, with the exception of a few scattered settlements on the Arkansas river, almost an unsettled wilderness, from the mouth of the river to the place where their establishment was finally fixed. By the law, as it then existed, they must, of necessity, have permission, either from the United States officer or from the Indian agent of the country, to go there, before they could make their establishment without violation of law. I believe it was not adverted to in the report, but I learn from unofficial sources, that the assent of Major Bradford was obtained; and he gave his sanction to the enterprise on account of the great want of a salt manufactory within a convenient distance. These men had to toil along the banks of the Arkansas. There are men here who know what it is to hug the rugged banks and sand bars of the Arkansas river, and toil up it with boats for a distance of two hundred miles, for weeks in succession. It must be remembered, that the country was then in the possession of the Osage and Cherokee Indians for almost the entire distance; and when the Beans arrived within one hundred or two hundred miles of the place where the establishment was located, they had absolutely to take the kettles and transport them with such a conveyance as the country afforded to the place of their enterprise.

The Senator from Kentucky adverted to a kind of calculation by which, according to his arithmetic, these men realized a fortune; and then, by the strangest deduction which I ever heard ciphered out, he argues that the amount of indemnity is to be refused, in regard to the value of the establishment lost by the act of the United States. They were perpetually depredated upon by the Osage Indians. There were weeks and months together when they could do nothing at their establishment. And as for the sale of their salt at one dollar a bushel, it was frequently taken in furs, which it cost a great deal to transport. I know something of the peculiar circumstances of the Beans; and their joint property, I understand, although they are prudent men, would not amount to half the profits which the Senator from Kentucky supposes they realized from their establishment.

According to the existing law in 1826, the settlers upon the Osage country could have acquired the right of preemption. In 1828 it was ceded to the Cherokees. We acknowledged the obligation of the Government to indemnify the settlers for their losses, by granting to them three hundred and twenty acres of land each, and that was given to several hundreds of them. But the Beans did not acknowledge that as at all satisfactory for the large amount which they invested in their enterprise, and they have now come here to ask, at the hands of a liberal Congress, indemnity such as may be commensurate with their losses. I have no hesitation in saying, according to the best conclusion I could form upon the evidence, that $15,000 is not too much, if you consider that they had the right of preemption, when Congress, by the sweeping effects of the treaty, ceded it away from them, and never gave them a compensation for it. It brings it then up to the case which the Senator from Kentucky supposes, that if they were entitled to the preemption, $15,000 is not too much. The Government, as I said before, have acknowledged the obligation to pay and indemnify the settlers on the ceded territory; but they made no provision, by the law of 1828, to indemnify persons who invested such amount as the Beans did in their salt works.

Mr. HOUSTON. I imagine that this case is not understood very well. I fancy that the Beans were not deprived of all the property that they took there; but when the works fell into other hands, the materials which they had were necessarily disposed of, and that they would receive the full value of them. Moreover, they were not entitled to any preemption for this tract of land. They could not be. It was reserved to the Chipewa Indians when it was purchased by the Government of the United States. A special reservation was made of the tract, as will be found by reference to the treaty, and the Beans thereby lost all their claim to it. I must confess, for I am personally friendly to the individuals, that it is strange I have never heard of this claim up to the present time. More than twenty years have elapsed since they made their establishment there, and I have never heard anything of it. I shall vote for the reconsideration.

Mr. UNDERWOOD asked for the yeas and nays on the question of reconsidering the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 21, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bradbury, Clemens, Dawson, De Saussure, Fish, Hale, Houston, King, Mason, Miller, Pearce, Pratt, Smith, Soule, Stockton, Toucey, Underwood, Upham, Wade, and Weller—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Borland, Brodhead, Charlton, Clarke, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Downs, Foot, James, Jones of Iowa, Norris, Rusk, Sebastian, and Walker—17.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. RUSK. I have a bill upon which I wish the Senate to act, and I therefore move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until Friday next.

Mr. HALE. I hope that will not be done. If it is, we shall have all this debate over again.

Mr. RUSK. I have no objection to acting finally upon this bill to-day, but my impression is that it will be discussed. I hold in my hand a bill which has already passed this body two or three times, and it will not take the Senate five minutes to pass it now. It is for the relief of a man who was wretchedly disabled in the Mexican war, while engaged as an express rider. He cannot procure a pension, because he was an express rider, and not in the Army. He carried, as is successfully shown, an express at an important time to save a good many difficulties, and while in the discharge of that duty was wretchedly mutilated. The bill has passed the Senate two or three times, and failed in the House for want of time. I hope it will be passed now. The man is here in poverty and want, and unable to get a living in consequence of his disability.

The PRESIDENT. The bill to which the Senator alludes is not now under consideration.

Mr. RUSK. I state this to endeavor to have it taken up.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I rise to offer a compromise to my friend from Arkansas, and that is, to let his bill go to the Committee on Claims, and I promise that I will agree to abide by whatever they say, without opening my mouth. We differ with regard to the facts, and I think it will be the proper course to send it to that committee for consideration.

Mr. BORLAND. I do not wish to press this bill on the consideration of the Senate now. I will ask the Senator from Kentucky to let its further consideration be postponed without opposition. I do not think I will trouble the Senate much with it hereafter, at any rate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection, but I think the course which I propose will be the better one.

Mr. HALE. I hope it will not be postponed. I have listened to these speeches once with a great deal of pleasure, but not with so much as to want to hear them over again; yet I think, if the further consideration of the bill be postponed until another day, notwithstanding the present disposition of Senators not to speak, they will do so. No man has much of an appetite immediately after dinner.

Mr. RUSK. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope the bill will be postponed. I wish, if it is proper that I should vote for it, to do so. If it is not proper, I wish longer time to investigate it. There are various documents connected with the case which I should like to see before I act upon it. If I can vote for the bill, I shall do so with great pleasure, on account of the claim; but I cannot vote for it under the present circumstances. It will be asking very little to ask to let it lie over until next Friday. I hope there will be no discussion on it. I only wish to look at the documents. I renew the motion to postpone its further consideration until next Friday.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN LE ROY.

Mr. RUSK. I move to postpone all prior orders, for the purpose of taking up the bill granting a pension to John Le Roy.

The motion was agreed to. The bill was read a second time, and the Senate proceeded to consider it as in Committee of the Whole. It enacts that there shall be allowed and paid to John Le Roy, who was an express rider in the late war with Mexico, a pension of $20 per month, to commence on the 22d of February, 1847, and continue during life.

Mr. PEARCE. I would inquire why a pension of $20 per month is proposed to be granted in this case?

Mr. RUSK. In consequence of the severe disablement of the person to whom it is proposed to be granted. He had one of his arms shot off.

Mr. PEARCE. Such an allowance has not generally heretofore been granted to common soldiers, even when totally disabled. This seems to me to be departing from the general usage, and I move to strike out $20 and insert $8 a month, the amount of pension allowed to soldiers.

Mr. RUSK. If the report of the Committee on Pensions is read, it will show the facts of the case.

The report was read, from which it appeared that the petition of John Le Roy was first presented to the Senate on the 31st of December, 1849, and that on the 12th of January, 1850, a report was made in the case, accompanied by a bill for his relief. From that report it appears that the petitioner was employed by the Quartermaster's Department of the Army as an express rider in the military service during the war with Mexico; and that on a highly-important emergency, when Colonel Irwin, of the Ohio volunteers, with a small force, was on the march to join General Taylor, previous to the Battle of Buena Vista, and became shut up in a town, and surrounded by a large body of the enemy, it became important to convey intelligence to that officer of his determination to send relief to him next morning. The petitioner promptly volunteered to convey this determination, and after gallantly running the gauntlet was fired upon by our own sentinel, and wounded in such a manner as to render the amputation of his arm necessary. When it is considered that Le Roy so nobly assumed such a responsible duty, and so gallantly performed it, penetrating the enemy's encampment, and being hotly pursued into the American camp, where, instead of receiving relief, he was fired upon by an American sentinel, and taken for one of the enemy, who were then close upon him, the committee thought it a highly meritorious case, and being recommended to the favorable consideration of the Government by the highest military authority, then in command of the Quartermaster's Department and the army in that part of the enemy's country, they had no hesitation in reporting a bill for his relief, and recommending its passage.

Mr. PEARCE. I do not see that this makes any difference at all. The case seems to me to be a meritorious one, but it is still that of a common soldier. We have had cases of soldiers who were mutilated just as much as this person is, who received but eight dollars a month. I do not see any reason for such a large increase to this individual. We have given but $8 a month to those who have braved death in all its forms in numerous battles. I think it would be well to put this case on the same footing as a common soldier.

Mr. BORLAND. I desire to say that this case is one of great merit, and it is not without precedent, so far as precedent may have weight with the Senator from Maryland. We had a case precisely similar two years ago, or rather in 1848, which provided for a pension of the same amount. I allude to the case of Jonathan Fitzwallier, formerly a citizen of Pennsylvania, who was in Mexico when the war broke out, and who was afterwards employed in the Quartermaster's Department. He was wounded on the 18th of August, not while riding an express, but while serving as a guide to a party sent out by our army—a sort of party of reconnaissance. He was not deprived of either of his limbs, but of one of his eyes. A bill was introduced for his relief, which granted a pension of $20 per month. It was a very meritorious case. I advocated it here, and it passed; and I do think this man, from the circumstances of the case, is entitled to an equal consideration. So far as precedent is concerned, then, I think the claim is fully sustained as well as upon its merits.

The amendment was not agreed to. The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

It was subsequently read a third time and passed.

ELIZABETH V. LOMAX.

On motion by Mr. MASON, the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill for the relief of Elizabeth V. Lomax. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Elizabeth V. Lomax, widow of Mann Page Lomax, deceased, late a major in the Ordnance Corps of the United States Army, on the pension roll, at the rate of $30 per month, from the 27th of March, 1842, for and during her natural life.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. This is one of the bills to which I objected some time ago. I rise to state to the Senate that I have found, from an examination of the report and accompanying papers, that the proof in the case was not complete until 1850, and yet the bill goes back some eight years, to 1842—thus allowing the sum of $3,000 or $4,000 by the retroaction.

The bill proposes to allow a pension from 1842. The proof, according to the report, was not complete until 1850. The difference would amount to some $3,000 or $4,000; and I think it altogether improper to allow it. Indeed, I think it is a very questionable case.

Mr. MASON. I desire to ask the Senator a question. What does he mean by saying that the proof was not complete? No application was made for a pension, as I understand the report, until 1850.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. So I understand, and of course the proof was taken in 1850, and the right to a pension was not established until that time. I understand, according to the doctrine of the Department, that they only allow the pension from the time the right is established by proof.

Mr. DAWSON. That is the law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes, that is the law; that is what we have been acting upon here; and this bill will be acting in disregard of that law. It retroacts, as I stated, to allow a pension for some eight years before the proof was complete. I therefore objected to the bill when it was up before. I have already stated that the whole matter is one which I think of a very doubtful character; but if the Senator will amend the bill so as to make it take effect from the time that the proof of the right was complete—which was on the 23d of May, 1850, I suppose, for that is the last date of the proof which I see—I will not go into an investigation of the right.

Mr. MASON. The lady for whose benefit this bill provides is an acquaintance of mine. She resides at Norfolk, in Virginia, where she has lived since the death of her husband. She is one of that class of our citizens who refuse to appeal to the bounty of the Government as long as they are able by their own hands to maintain themselves. Her husband died in 1842, and she opened a school, and gave lessons in music, and occupied her whole time in maintaining her children, that she might not be compelled to appeal to the bounty of the Government. She states at the close of her petition, what her friends know to be true, that "the measure of relief to which she may be entitled she submits to your sense of 'even-handed justice, deploring the necessity she is under for making this appeal to the bounty of the Government.'" If she had applied for the pension in 1842, she would then have been entitled to it; and I submit, when we have an example of one keeping aloof from the Government as long as she was able to provide for the children which were left upon her hands by the death of her husband, whether we should not give to her the arrears of pension? I presume it was for that reason the committee reported a bill to operate retroactively; and I submit to the Senate that she ought to have it.

A SENATOR. What are the grounds on which the bill is based?

Mr. MASON. A Senator inquires for the foundation of this claim. I will state the grounds on which it rests. Major Lomax was an officer of the Army, who, as is stated in the petition, and confirmed by proof, passed through his entire career, from 1807 to 1842, without ever having asked a furlough, or having been brought before a court-martial. He went into the Florida campaign after the death of Major Dade, and as is proved, went into it a man of robust health and capable of any endurance, but came out of it with his constitution shattered. These facts are in proof here.

Mr. BORLAND. I reported this bill from the Committee on Pensions. The Senator has correctly stated the ground on which the committee acted. We considered it a very meritorious case. Major Lomax is proved by the testimony, which is complete, to have been disabled by his service, and to have died of disease contracted by exposures and hardships in the service of his country.

I desire to take this occasion to call the attention of the Senate to one fact. I think it is time that it should be made known to the Senate and to the country, to meet what seems to be an apprehension in the minds of a great many Senators, that we shall bankrupt the Government if we go on granting pensions—that we are going to inflict great injury on the Government, and break it down with a big pension list. Now, although the expenditures of the Government are going on at a railroad pace, we find that the pension list, instead of increasing is diminishing. It is not so great as it was at the commencement of the Mexican war. It has been diminishing from the administration of General Jackson; and it is now less than it was before the commencement of the Mexican war, and is diminishing every year. I mention this to relieve the minds of Senators who have had serious apprehensions that our pensioning is growing to be a great burden upon the Government. We can yet take care of widows and orphans and disabled soldiers, who become so by the gallant deeds of themselves or of their fathers and husbands, without any danger of adding to the burdens of the Government. We are doing it with some degree of liberality; but we may do it with a great deal more without adding any great burden to the taxation which seems to be so alarming.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I said, if the gentleman would accept the amendment which I suggested, that I had nothing to say about the bill. I said, though, that I thought it was a doubtful case; and my friend from Arkansas reads me a lecture on the subject of my former opposition to pension bills, because I suggested the other day that we were in a fair way of putting one half of the community on the shoulders of the other half for support. I do not want to discuss this subject now. I have discussed this and all other questions almost so uselessly that I am tired of them; but I want everybody to stand upon the same footing, Mr. President. We have by our action, time and again said that pensions should not be allowed until the claim against the Government was fairly established by proof. When this bill came up I objected to it on that ground. It has been the rule upon all other pension bills since that time, and now are we to make Mrs. Lomax an exception? With what grace can we appear before the country in so doing? How can Senators stand when they apply a rule, and apply it in all cases since the objection has been raised, and yet make this an exception? The people of this country stand upon the same footing before the law, and I insist that you treat the widows of officers just as you treat the widows of soldiers—that you treat the humble and low just as you treat the famous and exalted. Have I done more than that, in asking the Senate to make the amendment that the pension in this case should commence on the 23d of May, 1850, when the proof was completed? No, sir; and is not that reasonable? If you intend to legislate for everybody alike, it is; if you intend to legislate on the ground of making favorites and exceptions, perhaps it is not. I have not the pleasure of knowing Mrs. Lomax, like my friend from Virginia, and of course I cannot be supposed to act on any spirit of sympathy growing out of that acquaintanceship, which no doubt has been highly pleasing to the Senator. All I ask is that we shall legislate for everybody alike.

There is another feature in this bill. It proposes to grant this lady a pension for life. Here is a law before me which provides that the widows of soldiers and officers dying in the service shall get a five years' pension; and if the widow happens to marry in that five years, the children shall get a pension if under sixteen years of age; but here, independent of marriage—independent of any limitation of five years, Mrs. Lomax is to go upon the pension list at the rate of $30 per month. Is not that difference enough, without adopting the retroactive principle to pay some three or four thousand dollars in addition? I should not have made these remarks if I had not considered that they were forced upon me in vindication of the amendment which I now offer. I move to strike from the bill the words "27th of March, 1842," and insert "23d of May, 1850."

Mr. BADGER. I rise, as I see my friend from Georgia [Mr. Dawson] endeavoring to obtain the floor, for the purpose of saying that I think every gentleman understands precisely the question before us, and to beg that we may now be allowed to vote upon it.

Mr. DAWSON. I was anticipating my friend from North Carolina. I saw that he was prepared to rise, and I know that he is exceedingly liberal in questions of appropriations. This is a question of some importance. What will be the consequences growing out of the adoption of the bill as it now stands? There are thousands and thousands of cases now in the Pension Office, which, as soon as you establish this principle, will present their claims for back pay; and upon what ground can the Congress of the United States oppose placing them upon the same footing? What I regret about it is, that the Senator from Virginia and myself have uniformly voted alike on this subject. I have no doubt that Mrs. Lomax is all he says she is, and that she has had a wonderful influence upon him. I have no doubt, if we establish this principle, that there will be other ladies claiming in the same way, who will be equally represented by other Senators, and not only thousands of claims will be presented, but hundreds of thousands of dollars will be taken out of the Treasury, in violation of the law which has been enforced for many years.

I have had a case of a lady, in which it took six years to consummate the proof, before the pension could be received; and the pension was only allowed from the consummation of the proof, according to the law. If this bill passes, I shall be in duty and honor bound to apply instantly to have her pension retroact, and commence at the period from which she was properly entitled to it, had the proof been presented. If we are to adopt the principle proposed in the bill, a better plan would be to pass a general law in the words that all persons shall be entitled to all arrearages of pension from the time they were entitled by law, and the proof considered as established, and that the money be appropriated and paid; otherwise we shall be overwhelmed here by numerous applications for special bills. It would be better, I say, to pass a general law to cover the whole of them. I am like the Senator from Kentucky. Let us not act specially—let us act generally upon our pension laws. As he says, every individual stands upon the same platform, and equal justice should be extended to all.

But these arguments have been often presented already, and adopted by the Senate, and, but for the great influence of my friend from Virginia, I do not think the proposition suggested would receive the support of the Senate. If his name now be placed as authority for this principle, it will command the respect of this body and of the other House, and a new principle will be ingrafted, or, in other words, the present law will be repealed, and all pensions will go back to the period from which they were entitled to receive them. I know of some in which twenty years passed before application was made for a pension. I will state one. A gentleman in Georgia was entitled to a pension in 1812. He never claimed it till 1850. Thousands of dollars, upon this principle, are now due to him; and, but for the law, I would apply for it. The Pension Office said it must take place from the consummation of proof, and that the law so required it. I had the papers before me for the purpose of having a bill drafted to cover the intermediate time, but I saw that it was contrary to the established principle, and I was unwilling to interfere and make a claim in opposition to it. But should this pass, I shall certainly make that application. I believe the principle would be wrong. I think it would be better to stand upon the established principle, without opening the question again. That is my view about the matter.

Mr. MASON. I do not wish to change any principle which has been established. The bill was reported by a member of the Committee on Pensions, the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. Borland,] and the reason why they propose to go back to the time of the death of the husband, was because of the fact that this good lady had set to all her countrymen and countrywomen a beautiful example, trusting to the labor of her own hands, and the exertions of her own intellect, to maintain her family since the death of her husband, rather than apply to the Government for relief; and that she did not apply until, through ill health, she became unable to maintain them. The bill, therefore, does not change any principle.

I would say in addition, that this fact was made known to me not by herself, but by those who were in intimate association with her. The case appealed to my sympathies, and I felt it my duty, as one of the legislators of the land, to present it here. I shall not press the matter, however, but am willing that the vote should be taken on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and taken with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Bayard, Charlton, Dawson, Dodge of Wisconsin, Felch, Foot, Hale, King, Pearce, Smith, Toucey, Underwood, Upham, Wade, Walker, and Weller—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Badger, Borland, Brodhead, De Saussure, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Downs, Fish, Gwin, Houston, Jones of Iowa, Mason, Norris, Rusk, Sebastian, Soule, and Stockton—17.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and the question was on its engrossment for a third reading.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I hope that the vote will be taken in the same manner as on the amendment. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. DAWSON. The better way would be to let the bill be laid upon the table for the present.

Mr. RUSK. Better let it be engrossed, and then ask for the yeas and nays on its passage.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken on the question of engrossment, and resulted—yeas 20, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Badger, Borland, Brodhead, De Saussure, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Downs, Fish, Foot, Gwin, Houston, Jones of Iowa, Mason, Norris, Rusk, Sebastian, Smith, Soule, and Stockton—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Charlton, Dawson, Felch, Hale, King, Pearce, Toucey, Underwood, Upham, Wade, Walker, and Weller—13.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was subsequently read a third time and passed.

HEIRS OF JOHN JACKSON.

Mr. GWIN. I hope there will be no objection to take up House bill No. 95, which is a bill for the relief of the heirs of John Jackson. It has been unanimously reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs, and I am anxious it should be acted upon. I trust it may now be taken up and disposed of. With that view I move that the previous orders be postponed, and this bill taken up.

Mr. HALE. I should like to ask if that is the bill to which the Senator from Indiana had an objection?

Mr. GWIN. For the information of the Senator from New Hampshire, I will state that the Senator from Indiana withdrew his objection, as also did the Senator from Michigan.

The motion to postpone the prior orders was agreed to, and the bill was considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and required to pay to the legal representatives of John Jackson, deceased, the pilot on board the Bon Homme Richard, during her brilliant action with the British frigate Serapis, in which action the said Jackson lost an arm, such a sum as will equal a pension at the rate of $6 per month, from the 15th day of November, 1779, to the day of said Jackson's death, agreeably to the pledge given by the captain of the said Bon Homme Richard, and the report of the committee of the Continental Congress, made on the 28th day of September, 1785.

No amendment being made, the bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, and read a third time and passed.

BENJAMIN S. ROBERTS.

Mr. FOOT. I move to postpone the previous orders, with a view to take up Senate bill entitled "A bill for the relief of Benjamin S. Roberts." I think it will lead to no discussion, and if it does, I will consent to its postponement. It is a very meritorious bill, proposing a partial repatriation for a great injustice done to a meritorious and gallant officer of the Army. It is reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, having passed that committee unanimously, by the late Senator from Georgia, (Mr. Berrien.) The reading of the report, which contains a full and minute statement of the facts upon which this claim is based, will be a sufficient argument in the case.

The motion to postpone the prior orders, and to take up the bill was agreed to, and it was read a second time, and the Senate proceeded to its consideration as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Benjamin S. Roberts, the full amount of his pay and subsistence as a second lieutenant in the first regiment of dragoons, from the 28th day of January, 1839, when he was coerced to resign his commission of second lieutenant in the first regiment of dragoons, without authority of law, until the 27th day of May, 1846, when he was restored to the Army, by being appointed senior first lieutenant in the regiment of mounted riflemen.

The reading of the report was called for, from which it appeared: that the memorialist, Benjamin S. Roberts, was, in the year 1836, a second lieutenant in the regiment of dragoons—was in the performance of staff duties as assistant commissary of subsistence, and acting assistant quartermaster at the dragoon station at Fort Des Moines, on the upper Mississippi river, and was in the receipt and disbursement of public moneys. That on the 28th of May, 1837, he had in his hands between three and four thousand dollars of such moneys in notes of the Commercial Bank of Cincinnati, one of the Government deposit banks, which had been placed in his hands for disbursement. That on that day intelligence was communicated to the memorialist, that the above-named bank had ceased to redeem its notes in specie, and in consequence the notes he held became utterly useless to him as a disbursing officer, the provisions of the specie circular of 1836 having forbade all disbursing officers of the Army to disburse or use for any public debt, any bank notes not redeemable in specie. That the memorialist exchanged the notes of the Commercial Bank, which had thus become unavailable in his hands, for an accepted draft on the Des Moines Land Company, which was then of undoubted credit, and indorsed the same to Colonel Mason, with a request that the proceeds should be deposited to the credit of the memorialist at St. Louis, the place where he had to pay over the balance which his accounts should exhibit to be due to the Treasury. That in consequence of some disagreement between the members of the Des Moines Land Company, at New York and their agents in the West, the acceptance of this draft was disavowed—its disavowal was followed by a protest, and thus the memorialist was deprived of the means of refunding to the Treasury the amount of the notes which had become unavailable in his hands, and for which the acceptance had been taken in exchange, in the hope of saving the amount to the United States. That, after much labor and expense had been incurred by the memorialist, these transactions were closed, by the interposition of Congress, to the satisfaction of the Treasury, and the memorialist stands acquitted, and wholly discharged from all claim against him by the United States.

The report further states that the memorialist never was a defaulter in the injurious sense of that term. He held an amount of public money which, under the regulations prescribed by Government to disbursing officers, became unavailable in his hands. He succeeded after much labor and expense in transferring the proceeds, to an extent considered satisfactory, to the Government; and was discharged from accountability. But while his accounts remained unsettled—while on the books of the Treasury he appeared as a defaulter, although he was not in fact—proceedings were had by the Commanding General of the Army which coerced him to surrender his commission, and drove him from the Army; which proceedings were contrary to equity and justice, unauthorized by law, and taken without conformity to the provisions of the acts of Congress on which they were professedly founded.

The act of the 31st January, 1823, required the officer at the head of a Department promptly to report to the President of the United States any disbursing officer or agent of the United States who failed to make quarterly returns, and such officer was to be dismissed from the service; but it also provided that such defaulting agent or officer should be continued in office, if he could satisfactorily explain his default to the President.

The subsequent act of 25th January, 1828, authorized the proper officer to withhold the compensation due to any defaulting officer until he should have accounted for and paid into the Treasury all sums for which he was liable, but provided that this should not extend to balances arising from the depreciation of Treasury notes received by him for disbursement; and made it the duty of the accounting officer, on the demand of such defaulting agent, to report the balance due to the Treasury Department, and to order a suit to be commenced within sixty days thereafter against the delinquent and his sureties.

Under this latter act, proceedings were had against the memorialist. The balance which appeared to be due by him was reported to the Treasury, and his pay, emoluments, and allowances were withheld.

In this state of facts, Major General A. Macomb, Commander-in-Chief of the Army, under the alleged authority of the Secretary of War, and, for aught that appears, without the intervention of the President of the United States, addressed to the memorialist a communication, stating that he had been reported by the accounting officer as a defaulter, and that his name had been submitted to the Secretary of War as such. That, in consequence, General Macomb was authorized to say that he would be permitted to resign his commission in the Army; but that if he did not resign, he would be dropped from the rolls.

The General stated that he was not personally acquainted with the state of the memorialist's accounts; and that the permission to resign was offered him rather as a matter of regard for his future prosperity, than from any other consideration. Under the pressure of the menace contained in this letter, to avoid the disgrace of dismissal, a young, inexperienced, and as recent subsequent events have shown, a gallant officer was driven to surrender his commission. It seemed to the committee that these proceedings were, in every respect, exceptionable; that the memorialist was in no just sense a defaulter; that the apparent default did not authorize the double proceeding which was taken against him; and that if a proceeding under the act of 1823 could have been allowed under the circumstances, it did not authorize a menace from the Commanding General, to coerce the resignation of the memorialist.

To restore to the Army, after a lapse of time, an officer thus unlawfully driven from the service would be embarrassing, because it would conflict with the rights of others. On the occurrence of the late war with Mexico, he was restored to the service by an appointment to a different regiment, and did gallant service; but the grant of his pay, emoluments, and allowances, from the time of his compulsory resignation to that of his reappointment, while it will, to that extent, repair the injustice which has been done to him, will conflict with no existing rights of other persons, and the committee accordingly report a bill for that purpose.

The bill was reported without amendment, and was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

WEST FELICIANA RAILROAD.

On the motion of Mr. BROOKE, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill for the relief of the West Feliciana Railroad Company as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to refund to the West Feliciana Railroad Company the amount paid by them in judgments obtained against said company by suits instituted on duty bonds given by said company, for the importation of certain bars of railroad iron, imported at New Orleans in the month of July, 1836, and at New York in the same month of the same year: Provided, That it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that the said railroad bars have been and are now permanently laid down upon the railroad of the aforesaid company, except such part thereof as may be proved to the satisfaction of said Secretary to have been lost by the sinking of the steamboat Chocataw, in an attempt to transport the same from New Orleans to Bayou Sara.

Mr. DAWSON. I desire to amend that bill. I hope the Senator from Mississippi will agree that it shall be laid upon the table, as I have a case precisely in point, which I have kept back for the purpose of moving it as an amendment to this bill. Not thinking the bill would be taken up to-day, I am not prepared to move the amendment now. I therefore move to lay the bill on the table.

With the assent of Mr. BROOKE, the motion was agreed to.

DONATIONS OF LANDS IN ARKANSAS.

The engrossed bill, entitled "An act to revive, for a limited time, an act in relation to donations of land to certain persons in the State of Arkansas," was read a third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Executive business.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I hope the Senate will consent to go into Executive session for a few moments, as there is a matter which it is desirable should be acted upon.

A division was called for on the motion, and there were—ayes 18, noes 5; no quorum voting. On motion, the Senate adjourned to Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 25, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Hon. ISAAC REED, member elect from the fourth Congressional district of Maine, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of the Hon. CHARLES ANDREWS, deceased, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

GRANTS TO THE STATES FOR RAILROADS.

The SPEAKER. The question first in order is the consideration of House bill No. 280, "making grants of land to aid in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes."

Mr. MOORE, of Pennsylvania. We have a very thin House this morning, and I trust that the various communications lying upon the Speaker's table from the several Departments, containing information which ought to be known to the House, may be laid before us and referred, before proceeding to the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. ORR. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania cannot, then, be entertained. The pending question is the motion to recommit the bill.

Mr. GORMAN. I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The motion for a call of the House is not in order, for the reason that the House is acting under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. STUART. On my demand the yeas and nays were ordered upon that motion.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk informs the Chair the yeas and nays were demanded, but not ordered.

Mr. STUART. They were ordered, and the report of the proceedings in the Globe shows that fact.

The SPEAKER. The Journal must then be corrected.

Mr. STUART. It ought to be amended. My recollection is very distinct upon the subject.

Mr. CARTER. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion, with a view of preventing a long debate on a point of order.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken upon the motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands, and it was disagreed to—yeas 64, nays 103; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Willis Allen, John Appleton, Ashe, Bragg, Brenton, Albert G. Brown, Busby, Joseph Cable, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Chastain, Churchwell, Cobb, Colcock, Daniel, John G. Davis, Dawson, Disney, Fiekin, Florence, Floyd, Giddings, Gorman, Hamilton, Hammond, Isham G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Hart, Hendricks, Hubbard, Hillyer, Holladay, Houston, Howard, Jackson, Andrew Johnson, John Johnson, George W. Jones, Preston King, Lockhart, Mace, McNair, McQueen, Meade, Millson, Molony, Murphy, Olds, Orr, S. W. Parker, Phelps, Powell, Richardson, Robbins, Ross, Scurry, Smith, Stuart, Sweetser, Townshend, Wallace, Wilcox, and Yates—64.

NAYS—Messrs. Charles Allen, Allison, William Appleton, Babcock, David J. Bailey, Barrere, Beale, Bell, Bennett, Bowie, Bowne, Breckinridge, Briggs, Brooks, George H. Brown, Burrows, E. Carrington Cabell, Caldwell, L. D. Campbell, Caskie, Chapman, Clark, Cleveland, Clingman, Cottman, Curtis, George T. Davis, Dimmick, Dockery, Doty, Duncan, Edmundson, Faulkner, Fowler, Henry M. Fuller, Gilmore, Goodenow, Harper, Haws, Haven, Horsford, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Thomas Y. How, Hunter, Ingersoll, James Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, George G. Stephens, Stratton, Taylor, Benjamin Thompson, Thurston, Toombs, Venable, Walbridge, Walsh, Ward, Washburn, Watkins, Welch, Wells, Addison White, Williams, and Woodward—103.

So the House refused to recommit the bill.

Mr. GORMAN. I believe the previous question has now exhausted itself.

The SPEAKER. It has not. The operation of the previous question is to bring the House to a vote first upon the motion to recommit, if there be one pending, then upon the amendments to the bill, and next upon the bill itself.

[Cries of "Question!" "Question!"]

Mr. GORMAN. Will it be in order, Mr. Speaker, to submit a motion that the bill be printed?

The SPEAKER. It will not.

Mr. CLINGMAN. The bill has been already printed.

Mr. BISSELL. I will make a motion which I believe to be in order, under the full conviction this bill has not received that consideration its importance demands—

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

Mr. BISSELL. I move that the bill be laid upon the table, and upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put upon the motion to lay upon the table, and it was disagreed to—yeas 79, nays 103; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, Willis Allen, Ashe, Bissell, Bocock, Bragg, Brenton, Albert G. Brown, Busby, Joseph Cable, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Caskie, Chastain, Churchwell, Cobb, Daniel, John G. Davis, Dawson, Disney, Durkee, Eastman, Edgerton, Edmundson, Faulkner, Fiekin, Fitch, Florence, Floyd, Freeman, Giddings, Gorman, Hamilton, Hammond, Isham G. Harris, S. W. Glancy Jones, Preston King, Letcher, Lockhart, Mace, McLanahan, McNair, McQueen, Meade, Millson, Molony, Murphy, Nabers, Olds, Orr, Penn, Phelps, Powell, Robbins, Ross, Savage, Scurry, Smith, Stuart, Sweetser, George W. Thompson, Townshend, Wallace, Wilcox, and Yates—79.

NAYS—Messrs. Charles Allen, Allison, William Appleton, David J. Bailey, Barrere, Beale, Bell, Bennett, Bowie, Bowne, Breckinridge, Briggs, Brooks, George H. Brown, Burrows, E. Carrington Cabell, Caldwell, Lewis D. Campbell, Chapman, Clark, Cleveland, Clingman, Conger, Cottman, Curtis, George T. Davis, Dimmick, Dockery, Doty, Duncan, Evans, Fowler, Henry M. Fuller, Gentry, Gilmore, Goodenow, Grey, Harper, Haws, Haven, Horsford, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Thomas Y. How, Hunter, Ingersoll, James Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George G. King, Kuhns, Kurtz, Landry, Mann, Humphrey Marshall, Martin, Mason, McMullin, Meacham, Miller, Henry D. Moore, John Moore, Morehead, Morrison, Murray, Outlaw, Andrew Parker, Samuel W. Parker, Perkins, Porter, Reed, Riddle, Robie, Sackett, Schermerhorn, Schoonmaker, Scudder, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Smart, Snow, Stanley, Benjamin Stanton, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stephens, Alexander H. Stephens, Stratton, Taylor, Benjamin Thompson, Thurston, Toombs, Venable, Walbridge, Walsh, Ward, Washburn, Watkins, Welch, Wells, Addison White, Williams, and Woodward—103.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. SAVAGE. I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands; and if it is in order I will take this occasion to say—

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. The Chair must remind the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. SAVAGE,] that debate is not in order upon his motion. The House is now acting under the operation of the previous question, which is not exhausted until the vote upon the passage of the bill shall have been taken.

Mr. SAVAGE. It was merely in explanation of my vote—

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. If the House be disposed to indulge remarks, the gentleman can proceed.

Several MEMBERS. I object, I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must enforce the rule.

Mr. FOWLER. I move to lay the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee has not relinquished the floor, and therefore the gentleman from Massachusetts cannot make his motion.

Mr. SAVAGE. I would be happy to avail myself of the opportunity afforded me by moving to reconsider a vote given contrary to my wishes, to express my sentiments in regard to the bill; but not being in order, I must withhold them.

Mr. GORMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. The motion now before the House, I believe, is to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to recommit the bill.

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I move to lay that motion upon the table.

Mr. HART. Upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I withdraw the motion to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I renew the motion.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BELL. I rise to a question of order. Did the gentleman who makes this motion to reconsider vote in the affirmative?

The SPEAKER. According to the record, the gentleman from Tennessee voted in the negative, and that placed him in the majority.

The question was then taken upon Mr. STEPHENS's motion, and there were—yeas 106, nays 72; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Charles Allen, Allison, Ashe, Babcock, David J. Bailey, Barrere, Beale, Bell, Bennett, Boeck, Bowie, Bowne, Briggs, Brooks, George H. Brown, Burrows, E. Carrington Cabell, Caldwell, Lewis D. Campbell, Caskie, Chapman, Clark, Cleveland, Clingman, Cottoman, George T. Davis, Dimmick, Dockery, Doty, Duncan, Edmundson, Evans, Fowler, Henry M. Fuller, Gentry, Gilmore, Goodenow, Grey, Harper, Haws, Haven, Horsford, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Thomas Y. How, Hunter, Ingersoll, James Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George G. King, Preston King, Kuhns, Kurtz, Landry, Mann, Humphrey Marshall, Martin, Mason, McLanahan, Meacham, Miller, Henry D. Moore, John Moore, Morehead, Morrison, Murray, Outlaw, Andrew Parker, Samuel W. Parker, Perkins, Reed, Riddle, Robie, Sackett, Schermerhorn, Schoolcraft, Schoonmaker, Scudder, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Smart, Snow, Stanly, Benjamin Stanton, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stephens, Alexander H. Stephens, Stratton, Taylor, Benjamin Thompson, Thurston, Toombs, Venable, Walbridge, Walsh, Ward, Washburn, Watkins, Welch, Wells, Addison White, Williams, and Woodward—107.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, Willis Allen, Averett, Thomas H. Bayly, Bissell, Bragg, Brenton, Albert G. Brown, Busby, Joseph Cable, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Chastain, Churchill, Cobb, Colcock, Daniel, John G. Davis, Dawson, Disney, Durkee, Eastman, Edgerton, Faulkner, Ficklin, Fitch, Florence, Floyd, Freckerton, Gorman, Green, Hamilton, Hammond, Isham G. Man, Sampson W. Harris, Hart, Hendricks, Hibbard, Harris, Holladay, Houston, Jackson, Andrew Johnson, Hillyer, Holladay, Robert W. Johnson, George W. Jones, J. John Johnson, Lotcher, Lockhart, McQueen, Meade, Mill-Glancy Jones, Murphy, Nabers, Olds, Orr, Penn, Phelps, Powell, Richardson, Robbins, Ross, Savage, Scurry, Smith, Smart, Sweetser, George W. Thompson, Townshend, Wallace, Wilcox, and Yates—92.

Mr. COBB. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has expired.

Mr. COBB. I move, then, to proceed to the business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I wish to inquire of the Chair if the House refuse to proceed to the business on the Speaker's table, whether it is not competent for a majority to go on and pass this bill? Let us pass this bill now.

The SPEAKER. Unless the contested-election case should intervene, it would be competent for a majority of the House to take such a course.

Mr. HAMILTON. I call for the consideration of the contested-election case.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I believe the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FULLER] has the floor, and with his assent I move to postpone that subject for one hour.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business, in the opinion of the Chair, would be the contested-election case from Pennsylvania, and will supersede the motion made by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. COBB], or even the motion—this being private bill day—to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. FULLER. I should regret that any business of mine should delay the public business; and if it be the desire of a majority of the House to proceed with this bill, I certainly will waive my right to address the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FULLER] yields the floor, I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has not yet indicated his purpose.

Mr. FULLER. Unless the majority prefer proceeding with this bill, I do not yield the floor.

The SPEAKER. There are various motions which may be made and which will lead the House to the consideration of business other than the consideration of this bill. This being private bill day, the motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar may be made.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I wish to make an inquiry of the House, and it is this: Would not this unfinished business be the first thing in order to-morrow morning? I trust the friends of the measure will agree to dispose of it to-morrow morning.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FULLER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I was about to reply to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS], as to what would be the order of business in the morning.

Mr. FULLER. I wish my position understood. I waive the floor, if it is desired by a majority of the House.

[Cries of "Go on!" "Go on!"]

Mr. SEYMOUR. Before the gentleman from Pennsylvania proceeds, I wish to ask a question of the Chair. If the contested-election case should be taken up now, I wish to know whether the present bill can be reached to-morrow morning by a majority vote?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire when that question is made, to be heard upon it. I wish to raise that question.

Mr. HOUSTON. I call for the regular order of business, and insist upon it.

Mr. FULLER. This delay I hope does not come out of my time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would have no objection to respond to the question of the gentleman from New York, but the regular order is called for, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will submit for the consideration of the Chair this point of order: The House having sustained the previous question, and ordered the main question to be put, I hold that the bill we are now considering overrides every other question.

Mr. HOUSTON. Has not the House passed from that question, and taken up another question? I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania has the floor. While I am willing to come to a vote upon that bill, I desire this election case disposed of in some way; for next week I intend to ask the House to act upon the appropriation bills. It is time they were passed; and if this question is not before the House, I call the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] to order.

The SPEAKER. The decision of the Chair was that this question, was the first business in order in the House.

Mr. HOUSTON. To-morrow morning?

The SPEAKER. It is the first business in order to-day.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is what I supposed. I ask the enforcement of that decision.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN], however, rises to a question of order connected with that decision, and the Chair must hear him.

Mr. CLINGMAN. The practice of the House has been uniform, that when they order the main question to be now put, it must be put.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FULLER] took the floor and was understood by gentlemen upon this side of the House as occupying the floor in the progress of his remarks, the House having clearly passed from this measure.

Mr. FULLER. My time has not yet commenced.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the question of order raised by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN.]

Mr. CLINGMAN. You will remember it has been invariably the settled practice, that when the previous question has been sustained during the morning, and the main question ordered to be put, that that matter must go on until the previous question has been exhausted, even though we went beyond the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. In reply to the gentleman, the Chair decides that reports from committees are confined to the morning hour under the special order of the House, and that this bill will be the first business in order to-morrow during the morning hour.

Mr. FULLER. Before I proceed with my argument, I wish to inquire of the Chair what is the usual course pursued in proceedings of this character? I know the contestant is here present, and I understand he desires to be heard by the House upon this question in his own behalf. If that be the case, I wish to move that he be furnished with a seat upon the floor for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that in very many cases contestants have been admitted to seats upon the floor, and been allowed to be heard in their own cases.

Mr. FULLER. I move, if the gentleman desires it, that he be permitted to do so in this case. [Cries of "Agreed!" "Agreed!"]

The question was then taken upon Mr. FULLER's motion, and it was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT then took a seat within the bar.

Mr. FULLER then replied to the remarks of Mr. ASHE, (which were delivered yesterday in support of the Report of the Committee of Elections,) and reviewed the various points connected with the case, and spoke in vindication of his right to the seat. Having occupied the hour allotted in debate, and not having finished his argument,

Mr. DUNCAN. It is, I believe, the unanimous wish of this House to allow the gentleman [Mr. FULLER] to proceed in his argument in this case.

Mr. LETCHER. I objected yesterday, to the chairman of the committee going on beyond his hour, and I gave notice that I should object to a departure from the rules of the House. I therefore feel bound to object to the gentleman's proceeding.

Mr. STANLY. The chairman [Mr. ASHE] has another hour to close in.

Mr. ASHE. I understand the House has allowed the contestant [Mr. Wright] the privilege of speaking.

The SPEAKER. The House has voted that the contestant may be heard in his own behalf.

Mr. H. B. WRIGHT, (the contestant,) having been privileged to address the House, briefly noticed certain charges made against him by Mr. FULLER, and then entered into the merits of the case in his own behalf. [Messrs. FULLER and WRIGHT's speeches are published in the Appendix.]

Mr. DAVIS obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. FOWLER, who moved that the House adjourn.

The question was put, and the motion agreed to; and

The House adjourned till to-morrow, at twelve o'clock, m.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. FOWLER gave notice that on to-morrow, or some subsequent day, he would ask leave to introduce a bill to amend the existing laws imposing duties on imports and regulating the appraisement of imported merchandise; and more effectually to prevent frauds against the revenue.

PETITIONS, &c.

The following petitions, memorials, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. LETCHER: The petition of P. W. Cooper and others, citizens of Hardy and Shenandoah counties, Virginia, praying for the establishment of a mail route from Moorefield, in the county of Hardy, to Mount Jackson, in the county of Shenandoah.

By Mr. DOTY: The petition of Abel Hawley, Leonard J. Farwell, and others, relative to the improvement of the navigation of "St. Clair Flats," in the State of Michigan.

Also, the petition of J. B. Mitchell, Davis H. Waite, and others, praying for a mail route from Fond du Lac, by Rosendale, Ripon, Ceresco, and Dartford, to Princeton.

Also, the petition of John C. Sherwood, A. B. Hamilton, and others, citizens of Dartford, in favor of the same route.

By Mr. ABERCROMBIE: The petition of Junius Gordon and others, praying an appropriation for the establishment of a regular mail communication, at frequent intervals of time, on the Gulf coast, between such points as are now provided.

By Mr. ST. MARTIN: The memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of New Orleans, signed by 881 citizens and commercial firms in said city, praying Congress to grant them the means, and appropriate a sufficient sum of money, to remove the obstructions and clear out the mouths of the Mississippi river.

By Mr. MOORE, of Louisiana: The memorial of a disinterested citizen of New Orleans, asking that the salary of the judge of the United States district court at New Orleans be ascertained.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, June 26, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order, is House bill No. 280, making grants of land to the several States and Territories for the construction of railroads, and for other purposes.

On the motion of Mr. DISNEY, by unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Lieutenant Thomas Lyon be withdrawn from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LANE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. LANE. I appeal to the gentleman from North Carolina, to allow me to introduce the resolution. It will cause no debate.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I am very anxious to dispose of the bill now before the House. I must insist upon the regular order of business.

Mr. LANE. I ask the gentleman at least to allow me to say a word with reference to the object of the resolution.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I must object.

GRANTS OF LANDS FOR RAILROADS.

The SPEAKER. The question pending is upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. MILLSON. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. COBB. It is very obvious that but a small portion of the members are present. I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. That can only be ordered by unanimous consent.

Objection was made.

Mr. SWEETSER. In order that we may have a quorum present, I move that the House do now adjourn, and upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the question being taken the result was—yeas 8, nays 158. So the House refused to adjourn.

[A message was received from the Senate, by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, its Secretary, announcing that the following bills had been passed by that body, viz:

An act for the relief of John Jackson;
An act for the relief of John Le Roy; and
An act to revive, for a limited time, an act in relation to donations of land to certain persons in the State of Arkansas.]

Mr. McMULLIN. I move that when this House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday at eleven o'clock, and that it continue to meet at that hour till the end of the session.

Mr. FICKLIN. I hope the hour will be fixed at ten o'clock.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order at this time. It is in order to make the motion that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet at that hour, but the gentleman cannot change the regular hour of meeting upon a simple motion.

Mr. McMULLIN. Then I wish to give notice that I will offer such a resolution upon Monday.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Is it in order to give that notice at this time?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order, if objection be made.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object.

The SPEAKER. Then the notice cannot be entered upon the Journal.

The yeas and nays were then ordered upon the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the result was—yeas 96, nays 86; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Charles Allen, Allison, William Appleton, Babcock, Barrere, Beale, Bell, Bennett, Bowne, Briggs, Brooks, George H. Brown, Burrows, E. Carrington Cabell, Caldwell, Lewis D. So the bill passed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND, when his name was called, stated that he had paired off with Mr. BOWIE, or he should have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move that the vote just taken; by which the bill passed, be reconsidered, and that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The question was taken, and the latter motion was agreed to.

The title of the bill was then read, as follows:

An act making grants of lands to aid in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes.

The question was taken, and the above was adopted as the title.

Mr. STEPHENS. I move that the vote just taken, by which the title of the bill was adopted, be reconsidered, and that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The question was taken, and the latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I was absent at the time the vote was taken upon the land bill this morning, being detained by an unavoidable accident. I rise, therefore, for the purpose of asking the unanimous consent of the House that I may record my vote in favor of the bill.

Mr. STUART. I object.

Mr. COBB. I would inquire of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNETT] if he has any other bills to report from the Committee on Public Lands?

Mr. BENNETT. I have not.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Public Lands, then reported back, with adverse reports, sundry petitions in relation to the removal of the land office in the State of Alabama; which were laid on the table.

Mr. COBB. The Committee on Public Lands have also instructed me to report back, with a recommendation that it do not pass, House bill No. 115, introduced by my colleague, [Mr. SMITH,] asking that the swamp lands granted or proposed to be granted by the General Government per act passed during the last session of Congress, may be diverted to purposes other than those contemplated in the bill.

[On motion by Mr. COBB, it was ordered to be laid upon the table.

LANDS GRANTED TO ALABAMA.

Mr. COBB. I would call the attention of my colleague [Mr. HOUSTON] to a bill which I am about to report, founded upon a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Alabama, accompanied by a letter from the Governor of that State, asking the Congress of the United States to authorize the State of Alabama to complete her location of lands under the acts of 1847 and 1849. In accordance with the provisions of those acts, she located the lands to which she was entitled, but owing to a location upon some lands in the State of Louisiana, which, when the returns were made to the General Land Office, were found to have been previously located, or constituted a portion of old Spanish grants, there was a deficiency to the extent of the lands so located. The Legislature of Alabama has accordingly sent in a memorial asking Congress to extend the time for the location of those lands. My colleague [Mr. HOUSTON] desires that the bill should be passed. He is present and can make his own suggestions, inasmuch as he understands the subject much better than I do. It is simply a question as to extending the time in which the State of Alabama may locate the lands to which she is entitled under previous acts of Congress.

The bill was then read a first and second time by its title, which was as follows:

"A bill to extend the provisions of the act approved March 3d, 1847, and the act approved February 25th, 1849, for carrying into effect the existing compacts with the States of Alabama and Mississippi, in relation to the five per cent. fund and school reservation."

Mr. COBB. If it be the pleasure of the House to pass this bill now, it will be an accommodation to the State of Alabama, as she can then proceed to locate those lands.

Mr. STUART. I wish to inquire if the Committee on Public Lands have made any report on this subject?

Mr. COBB. The committee have made no report. I will say, however, that a letter from the Governor, as well as a memorial from the Legislature of Alabama, accompanies this bill, which will explain the subject much better than I can do it.

Mr. STUART. All I wanted was, that if the Committee on Public Lands had made a report, that report should be made known.

Mr. HOUSTON. If it is the wish of my colleague, [Mr. COBB,] I will occupy the time of the House a few moments. This bill is intended to supply the sixteenth sections, or which amounted to the sixteenth sections, which were lost to a certain portion of the State of Alabama by the treaty between the United States and the Chickasaw Indians, which treaty, as everybody knows who has looked into it, bound the United States to put up for sale, at certain specified periods, and at certain graduated prices, all the Chickasaw lands, irrespective and regardless of the sixteenth sections. Hence, certain portions of the State, lying in my district, lost the sixteenth sections. At a previous session of Congress, a law was passed authorizing the State of Alabama, within a certain time, to make selection of such an amount of lands as would supply the deficiency. The agent of the State did select the lands, but the selection occupied all the time that was allowed by the law of Congress. When the selection, however, came up to the Land Office, it turned out that a portion of the lands he had selected had been previously entered by individuals, and was then private property. This bill proposes, as the time has elapsed in which the State is authorized to make the selection, simply to extend the time, and allow the State again to select other lands in lieu of those selected erroneously.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time and passed.

RIGHT OF WAY.

Mr. COBB. The Committee on Public Lands have also had under consideration Senate bill No. 362, to grant the right of way, &c., to the St. Genevieve Iron Mountain and Pilot Knob Plank-Road Company. The committee have matured a general bill for railroads and plank roads, &c., in such cases, which we think is better than the Senate bill; and I am instructed accordingly to make an adverse report upon the same, and I move it be laid upon the table.

The report was received, and the bill was ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. COBB. I now present a bill from the same committee, founded on the memorial from the Legislature of the State of Alabama, asking the right of way and alternate sections of the public lands to aid in the construction of certain railroads and plank-roads. We have concluded to report a general bill granting the right of way to rail and plank roads in the United States. It is a matter in which the whole country is interested more or less, and I shall be very glad, if it shall be the pleasure of the House to pass the bill, after having heard it read. But if there shall be objection to it, it can be referred according to the will of the House. I think, however, there can be no objection to it.

The bill was then read a first and second time by its title, as follows:

"A bill to grant the right of way to all railroads and plank-roads passing through public lands belonging to the United States."

Mr. BOCOCK. Let us have the bill read entire.

The bill was accordingly read by its sections.

Mr. COBB. I think it will, perhaps, facilitate the business of Congress, if there is no objection to the bill, to have it passed now.

Mr. SWEETSER. I desire to submit a motion to refer that bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BISSELL. I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that in all probability such a disposition of it would be equivalent to its defeat. It is a harmless bill, and one that will save a great deal of special legislation. It simply provides that regularly-incorporated railroad and plank-road companies may run their roads over public lands in any State where the Legislature of that State shall authorize them to be constructed. It is something which is never now refused in special cases; and the only effect of the passage of this bill will be to save Congress the time and trouble of legislating upon scores of individual bills, asking the right of way for rail and plank roads over the public lands. This general bill gives to regularly-incorporated railroad and plank-road companies the right and privileges of running over public lands in any State where the Legislature of that State shall authorize them to run.

Mr. SWEETSER. I hope the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] will allow me to reply.

Mr. COBB. Certainly; I yield the gentleman that privilege.

Mr. SWEETSER. I would yield with great pleasure to the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BISSELL], did I not know that the rights which would be conferred by this bill would, to a great extent, be abused. It is well known to members of this House that I make a question in relation to the right proposed to be granted by this bill; and that objection I wish to discuss in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I do not believe it is necessary to have the action of Congress in relation to this matter. I should be glad to accommodate the gentleman could I agree with him in his conclusions; but should the House determine against me, I shall be satisfied. I deem it a matter of duty to ask the House to refer this bill to the Committee of the Whole, where we may discuss it.

Mr. BISSELL. I will ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWEETSER] to give way to me, that I may make a motion which will obviate the difficulty. Though I regard it as a harmless bill, yet I well know that members have not examined it; and to avoid the difficulty of sending it to the Committee of the Whole, and to give every gentleman an opportunity to investigate it, I will move, if the gentleman will allow me the floor for that purpose, that the consideration of this subject be postponed to a day certain, say until Wednesday next.

Mr. SWEETSER. I yield to the suggestion of the gentleman, and withdraw my motion to refer.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I suppose Monday will be long enough to postpone it.

Mr. BISSELL. Say Monday, then.

Mr. STEPHENS. Will not this be the first business in order on Monday?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it will.

Mr. STEPHENS. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. COBB. I move to recommit this bill to the Committee on Public Lands, and that it be printed.

Mr. CABLE, of Ohio. Is it in order to make a motion to refer this bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. Such a motion is in order.

Mr. CABLE. Then I make that motion.

Mr. COBB. How can the gentleman get the floor to make that motion?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] has not yielded the floor, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CABLE] cannot make the motion.

Mr. COBB. I have not yielded the floor. I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands, and that it be printed.

The SPEAKER. That motion has already been made.

Mr. COBB. Then I move that the House proceed to the consideration of business upon the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has not expired, and the motion is not in order.

Mr. COBB. Then I call for the previous question on my motion to commit.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. Will the motion made by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. COBB], supposing it to be adopted, procure the printing of the bill, to which the motion refers?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman to withdraw the motion to postpone and print, and to move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands, and that it be printed.

Mr. STANTON. If the motion to print be not put, will the bill be printed?

The SPEAKER. It will not.

Mr. STANTON. Then I do not see the necessity of postponing it.

Mr. CARTER. Has the morning hour now expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. CARTER. I move that the House proceed to the consideration of business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. DANIEL. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. HAMILTON. I make the inquiry of the Chair whether the Pennsylvania contested-election case is not the first business now in order?

The SPEAKER. It is, if called up.

Mr. HAMILTON. I then move we proceed to its consideration.

Mr. DANIEL. I submit whether my motion is not in order? This contested-election case can be considered next week. We have not transacted private business for several weeks. I trust we will go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Pennsylvania contested-election case is now under consideration, upon which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] is entitled to the floor, and unless he yields, it is not in order for the gentleman from North Carolina to submit the motion.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts. I am willing to yield the floor, to allow the gentleman an opportunity to submit his motion.

[Cries of "Oh, no!" "Oh, no!"]

Mr. HOUSTON. I am of the opinion that we can complete the consideration both of the contested-election case and the business to which the gentleman from North Carolina refers.

Mr. DANIEL. I submit now the motion that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The question was then taken, and it was agreed to.

PENNSYLVANIA CONTESTED ELECTION.

The SPEAKER. The business now in order is the consideration of the Pennsylvania contested-election case, upon which the gentleman from Massachusetts is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, then addressed the House in opposition to the report of the Committee, and in favor of the right of the sitting member, Mr. FULLER. [Mr. D.'s speech is published in the Appendix.]

Mr. HAMILTON addressed the House an hour, in support of the conclusions of the committee that the election had been irregular, and that the seat of the sitting member should be vacated, and the election returned to the people. [His speech is published in the Appendix.]

Mr. TOOMBS addressed the House an hour, in favor of the right of the sitting member to the seat, maintaining that it was not shown that the election was irregular or illegal.

Mr. ROSS next obtained the floor, but yielded it to

Mr. STUART, who moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and the House adjourned till Monday next.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, June 28, 1852.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. M. BETLER.
The Secretary being about to read the journal,

Mr. BRODHEAD arose and said: I move that the reading of the Journal be dispensed with. It contains mainly the action of the Senate on a large number of adverse reports. The Journal is very long, containing some twenty or thirty pages, which will occupy some time in the reading. This I think cannot be necessary, and I hope the reading will be dispensed with, at least so far as relates to the adverse reports.

Mr. MANGUM. I think it is a very bad precedent indeed, to dispense with the reading of the Journal ever. I know that it has sometimes been done, at or near the close of a session, when the Senate is pressed for time; but I think it is a very bad precedent.

The PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina object?

Mr. MANGUM. I do.

The reading of the Journal was proceeded with. Mr. MANGUM subsequently rose and said: At the instance of other gentlemen, I move to dispense with the reading of the Journal, so far as relates to the action of the Senate upon the long list of adverse reports only.

The motion was agreed to, and the residue of the Journal was read and approved.

CHEVALIER HULSEMAN.

A message from the President of the United States was received by Mr. MILLARD P. FILLMORE, his Secretary, transmitting a report of the Secretary of State, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 3d instant, requesting the President to communicate to the Senate, if consistent with the public interests, a copy of a communication made by M. Hülsemann, now or late Chargé d'Affaires of the Emperor of Austria, on or about April 29, 1852, to the Secretary of State of the United States, on the occasion of the withdrawal of M. Hülsemann from his place as Chargé; also, a copy of the reply thereto, made by the Secretary of State; and also copies of all correspondence touching the matters which are the subjects of the said communication of M. Hülsemann, containing the above correspondence; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. FISH presented a memorial of merchants and shipmasters of New York, praying an appropriation for the purchase of a suitable plot of ground in one of the large cemeteries near that city, for the use of seamen; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MASON presented a memorial of the president and directors of the Alexandria and Washington Turnpike Company, praying an appropriation for the repair or reconstruction of the Potomac Bridge connecting Washington city with the Virginia shore; and also praying that the attention of Congress may be directed to the subject during the present session; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WADE presented a petition of citizens of Braceville, Ohio, praying that the bill now pending before Congress, commonly called the "homestead bill," may become a law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SOULE presented the memorial of John L. Collins, praying remuneration for losses and damages sustained in consequence of his expulsion from Mexico; which was referred to the select committee appointed on the subject of claims against Mexico.

Also, a memorial of importers of wines, brandies, &c., at New Orleans, praying an increase of the number of gaugers, at that port; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DOWNS presented the memorial of Andrew Hodge, jun., praying the enactment of a law authorizing such an arrangement with him as one of the sureties of William H. Kerr, late postmaster at New Orleans, as will, while it protects the Government from total loss, save him from ruin; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, presented three petitions from citizens of Iowa, praying that the bill now pending before Congress, commonly known as the "homestead bill," may become a law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. GWIN presented the petition of William D. Porter, a lieutenant in the United States Navy, praying an appropriation for an exploration of the interior of Africa, by the way of the White Nile; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BRIGHT presented a petition of citizens of Milford, Indiana, praying that the bill now pending before Congress, commonly known as the "homestead bill," may become a law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WALKER. I wish to present the memorial of clerks and others connected with the Capitol, setting forth the deleterious effects of the Alanthus tree growing on the Capitol grounds, and praying the adoption of measures for its extermination, which I move to refer to the Committee on Public Buildings. In connection with this, I wish to call the attention of the committee to the following notice, which I see in one of the morning papers:

"Declared a Nuisance.—We learn that the Board of Health have declared the numerous shade trees planted in various parts of the city, called the Alanthus, (or tree of Heaven,) which emits, when in bloom, so oppressive an odor, a nuisance, and, as a consequence, will ultimately be supplanted by others less objectionable."

I merely wish to call to this the attention of the Committee on Public Buildings, that they may give us their determination on the subject at as early a day as possible.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings.

PETITION WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. STOCKTON, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Evelina Porter, widow of Commodore David Porter, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. FELCH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the petition of Joseph Traskolawski, praying to be allowed additional compensation for surveying certain public lands, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition and papers; which was agreed to.

Mr. FELCH. I ask, on behalf of the Committee on Public Lands, that it be discharged from the consideration of numerous petitions, asking for grants of land to several States for the purpose of constructing railroads. Most of these petitions have been acted upon directly or indirectly in the reports heretofore made. I move that the committee be discharged from their further consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FELCH. I am also instructed by the same committee to report back the bill granting to the State of Wisconsin the right of way and a donation of the public land for the purpose of locating and constructing a railroad from Milwaukee to Prairie la Crosse. A bill has already passed embracing this route, and I move, with the consent of the Senator from Wisconsin, that the consideration of the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. WALKER. I have no objection to that course.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FELCH also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill making a grant of public lands to the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, in aid of the construction of a railroad from Cincinnati to St. Louis, submitted an adverse report thereon.

Mr. SHIELDS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the report of the Secretary of War in relation to the settlement of accounts of officers connected with military contributions, reported a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of the accounts of public officers, and others, who may have received moneys arising from military contributions, or otherwise, in Mexico," approved March 3, 1849; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. ATCHISON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the report of the Second Auditor, communicated the 21st of April, with copies of certain accounts, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that it be referred to the Committee on Printing; which was agreed to.

Mr. DOWNS, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the petition of John Crawford, praying to be allowed to locate a certificate for forfeited land stock on public land lying beyond the territory for which the certificate was granted, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BROADHEAD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the memorial of Captain Joseph Whipple, praying the settlement of his account on principles of equity and justice, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Captain Joseph Whipple, deceased; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BAYARD, from the select committee, who were instructed by a resolution of the Senate to examine and report what alteration should be made in the plan for the publication of the returns of the Seventh Census, as exemplified in relation to the State of Maryland, submitted a report; which was ordered to be laid on the table and printed.

Mr. CLEMENS. I have here a memorial, which I suppose reached the Committee on Private Land Claims by mistake. It is the memorial of the heirs of Pascal Detchemdy, praying the confirmation of their title to a tract of land in Missouri. An adverse report was made in the case on the 28th of March, 1850, which was agreed to by the Senate on the 24th of June, 1850. There have been no new papers presented since that time. It therefore reached the committee at this session in violation of the rule, and I suppose by mistake. I move that the Committee on Private Land Claims be discharged from the further consideration of it.

The motion was agreed to.

MILITARY SITES.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Committee on Military Affairs have instructed me to report a bill to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the sale of certain military sites," approved March 3d, 1819, and to ask that it be considered now. This bill has been prepared at the request of the War Department, to meet a necessity that has arisen in that Department. As it is merely to supply what may be called an omission in the former law, I ask that it may be taken up now for consideration.

The bill was read a first time and ordered to a second reading. There being no objection, it was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the act "authorizing the sale of certain military sites," approved 3d March, 1819, be so construed as to apply to all military sites and arsenal sites belonging to the United States which may be found at any time to be useless for military purposes.

Mr. CASS. There cannot be any objection to this bill. I have had some occasion to look into the matter, and I find that the case is simply this: The Attorney General has decided that the law of 1819 does not extend to sites acquired subsequently to its passage. Therefore, where the United States have acquired such sites subsequently to the passage of the original law, and they have become useless, the Department has no power to dispose of them, and there they remain. The only object of the Department is to extend the law to the present time; so that sites acquired subsequently, as well as previously, may come within the original law, as was evidently the intention.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

BILL PASSED.

The engrossed bill for the relief of Benjamin S. Roberts was read a third time and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message was received from the House of Representatives by Mr. FORNEY, its Clerk, announcing that it had passed the following bills:

An act to extend the provisions of an act approved March 3, 1847, and an act approved February 26, 1849, for carrying into effect the existing compacts with the States of Alabama and Mississippi, in relation to the five per cent. fund and school reservations; and

An act making grants of lands to aid in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes.

The above-named bills were read a first and second time by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

A further message from the House of Representatives also announced that it had passed the bill from the Senate to amend an act entitled "An act to carry into effect the convention between the United States and the Emperor of Brazil of the 27th of January, 1849," approved March 29, 1850, with an amendment.

CHARGES AGAINST THE BOUNDARY COMMISSIONER.

Mr. WELLER. I desire to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the charges preferred by Colonel J. McClellan, of the Topographical Corps, and others, against J. R. Bartlett, appointed commissioner to run and mark the boundary line between the United States and the Republic of Mexico, be referred to a select committee of five for investigation, with power, if necessary, to send for persons and papers.

I desire that this resolution may be received now by the Senate, and I will call it up to-morrow for action. There were some charges made against me a few years ago to the Senate, when I was acting as commissioner on that boundary line, to which I desire to reply. I now give notice, that I shall on to-morrow call up the resolution.

The resolution was laid over under the rule.

SHIP CANAL AT THE SAULT STE. MARIE.

Mr. FELCH. There is a bill on the table providing for a donation of lands for the construction of a ship-canal around the Falls of the Sault Ste. Marie. When that bill comes up, I desire to offer an amendment, which will be, in fact, a substitute for the bill. I would ask, either that the bill be taken up to permit me to offer the amendment, or by unanimous consent, I will offer the amendment now, and have it ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT. If such is the pleasure of the Senate, it will now be received informally, and ordered to be printed, so as to be in the possession of Senators when the bill comes up for consideration.

There being no objection, that course was pursued.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On the motion of Mr. GWIN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened,

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 28, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

RIGHT OF WAY TO RAILROAD COMPANIES.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the consideration of the motion made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] to recommend to the Committee on Public Lands House bill No. 284, entitled "A bill to grant the right of way to all rail and plank roads passing through lands belonging to the United States."

THE GARDINER CLAIM.

Mr. OLDS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the resolution I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

Mr. COBB. Will the time occupied in the consideration of the resolution be taken from the morning hour?

Mr. OLDS. I ask its introduction and consideration before the House proceeds to the special order.

The Clerk then read the resolution, as follows: Whereas, it is believed that spurious and fraudulent claims have been passed upon, and allowed by the Mexican Claims Commission: And whereas, among the claims said to be fraudulent, was one belonging to Dr. John A. Gardiner, amounting to a large sum, said to be nearly half a million of dollars: And whereas, a grand jury, for the District of Columbia, upon their oaths, have presented the said Dr. Gardiner for the crime of perjury, committed in his testimony, substantiating his said claim before the said Mexican Claims Commission: And whereas, public rumor charges that the Secretary of the Treasury was the agent or counsel of the said Dr. Gardiner, in the prosecution of the said alleged fraudulent claim, and that the said Secretary of the Treasury had a fee interest in said claim, amounting to a large sum, said to be one hundred thousand dollars: And whereas, common rumor still further charges, that the said Secretary of the Treasury, for a sum said not to exceed fifteen thousand dollars, purchased and held the one fourth interest of said alleged fraudulent claim: And whereas, the said claim, amounting to four hundred and twenty-eight thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars, has, upon the warrant of said Secretary of the Treasury, been paid: And whereas, Mr. Corwin, disregarding the pledge of his immediate representative, has failed to call for an investigation of said allegations: Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee, to be appointed by the Speaker, consisting of five members of this House, be required to investigate all the facts touching the connection of the said Thomas Corwin, the present Secretary of the Treasury, with the said Gardiner claim; what fee, if any, he was to receive for his services as agent or counsel for said Gardiner; what interest, if any, other than his fee-interest, he purchased and held, either directly or indirectly, in said claim, and the amount paid or stipulated to be paid, therefor, and conditions of such purchase; at what time he ceased to act as agent or counsel of said Gardiner; to whom and for what consideration he disposed of his fee-interest; to whom and for what consideration he disposed of his one fourth interest in said claim.

Resolved further, That said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. TOOMBS. I object to the resolution. I desire the responsible charge from a responsible source. If any gentleman makes the charge upon his own responsibility, I will not object. Public rumor should not be brought in here against anybody without caution.

Mr. OLDS. Has the gentleman reference to the resolution I have introduced?

Mr. TOOMBS. I have. Public rumor should not be brought in here as the sole basis of inquiry into anybody's conduct. I will never act upon public rumor to put anybody upon their trial. It is against the principles of jurisprudence of this country.

Mr. OLDS. The rumor is of a character sufficient to cause a committee of inquiry to be appointed.

Mr. TOOMBS. I am opposed to acting upon mere public rumor.

Mr. OLDS. There is more than public rumor to justify the investigation.

Mr. POLK. How can you find out the truth of facts unless a committee is appointed to make inquiry?

Mr. TOOMBS. Let some one father the charges. That is the way to get at the matter.

Mr. OLDS. I am disposed to father them.

Mr. TOOMBS. Then do it.

Mr. OLDS. I do.

BRAZILIAN INDEMNITY.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. There is a bill upon the Speaker's table which I have been instructed by a unanimous vote of the Committee on Foreign Affairs to ask to be taken up and passed. It passed the Senate without opposition, and was indorsed by the unanimous vote of our committee. If it is not passed in two days, the time will have elapsed in which it can be done with the view to any good.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I object to the passage of that bill. I think it ought not to pass.

Mr. BAYLY. I beg the gentleman from Tennessee to withdraw his objection. I can satisfy the House in a few minutes, that unless the bill is passed within two days—to-day or to-morrow—the greatest inconvenience and wrong will ensue. The bill is with respect to the payment of the Brazilian indemnity.

Mr. HOUSTON. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. BAYLY. A motion to suspend the rules, I believe, is not now in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not, and will not be in order till after the expiration of the morning hour. The first business in order is the consideration of House bill No. 234, "A bill to grant the right of way to all rail and plank roads passing through the public lands belonging to the United States." The pending question is upon the motion to recommit.

Mr. COBB. My object in moving the recommitment of the bill to the Committee on Public Lands, and calling the previous question upon that motion, was to keep the bill before the House. I withdraw the call for the previous question, as my object has been accomplished, and also the motion to recommit the bill. Were I aware of the sense of the House upon this subject, I would not trespass upon their time for one moment. This is a public measure—one in which every State of the Union feels more or less interest. Every man here desirous of transacting the public business, must feel the importance of passing a general bill providing for the granting to rail and plank road companies the right of way through the public land of the United States. There are, at this time, in the Union, fifty of these companies organized, and progressing with the completion of such works. Shall we, I ask, provide for special cases as they come up, or now pass a general bill providing for the whole of them? That is the question to be submitted to everybody throughout the country, especially this body. I am a friend of this measure, along with every other member of the House; but not in any particular manner. It has been suggested to me that I move that the bill be postponed till next Monday, and be ordered to be printed. Every member by that time may examine it thoroughly, and be in a condition to vote understandingly upon it. If any one in the House desires its consideration postponed, I will make the motion I have indicated.

[Cries of "Postpone it!" "Let us pass it now!"]

Mr. COBB. Some say let us pass it now, and others move to postpone its consideration. The best course for me to pursue, I think, is to submit the motion that the bill be postponed till Monday next, and that it be ordered to be printed. It will be before each member, who then may vote according to the dictates of his own judgment.

A VOICE. The House will not be in session next Monday.

Mr. COBB. Well, I will then move that the consideration of the bill be postponed till Tuesday week, and that it be printed.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will that bill then come up in the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have no objection to it.

So the further consideration of the bill was postponed till Tuesday week.

BRITAIN FRANKS.

Mr. COBB. I have a measure which I desire to present for the consideration of the House, which is founded upon principles of justice. It is an act for the relief of Britain Franks. I have not reported a solitary measure, except one, in which my constituents have been interested. The bill which I now submit is one in which my constituents are interested, and it is one which I am directed to report back to the House. I will state the substance of it. I hold in my hands a land warrant issued to a soldier in the Mexican war, which he thought advisable to sell before it was issued. He constituted the Hon. JEREMIAH CLEMENS, of the Senate of the United States, his attorney to transfer the warrant, whenever it was issued, of the individual from whom he had received a valuable consideration. Every man here is aware that the law makes such transfers void. After the warrant was issued, the Hon. Mr. CLEMENS went on to make the transfer according to the provisions of his power of attorney.

I received a letter, a few days ago, from a very respectable house—the firm of Bradley, Wilson, & Co.—in the town of Huntsville, Alabama, enclosing this warrant, and stating that the gentleman to whom it was issued had committed a capital offense, and ran away. Unless this House, by an act of liberality, authorize the gentleman who sold the warrant to receive its benefits, it will be lost to everybody. The contract was executed in good faith, the power of attorney was executed in good faith, and the transfer was made in good faith. I ask the House to pass the bill which has been drawn up by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and to which there can be no objection. They stated to me, at the Land Office, that there are many precedents for the present bill. I ask the House, then, to listen to the reading of the bill submitted from the General Land Office, and if they choose to pass it, I will consider it as a great favor rendered to the individual who is entitled to receive its benefits.

The bill was then read through by the Clerk.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I understand this to be a private bill, and I ask the House that it shall go to a Committee of the Whole House, and take its chances with all others.

Mr. COBB. I state the facts, and if the House desire it, let them send this bill to a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. JONES. I do not know as we shall ever get clear of calling on the Committee on Public Lands for reports. The Committee on Claims have not reported for four or five months, and if we set the example of now passing this private claim, the Committee on Claims will come up and ask us to pass everything which they may report to the House, and we shall not get through with that committee during the remainder of this session, even if we sit till the first day of September. I hope the House will let these bills all take the same chance.

Mr. COBB. I make the motion I have, and I am willing to take the sense of the House. I am determined to submit to their will.

Mr. NABERS. I will suggest to the gentleman that it would be better to frame a general bill for these cases. I have one of the same character, and precisely in the same condition. A general law for these cases will meet the approbation of the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not know that I am right, as I am not very learned in the law; but it strikes me that where parties have not made contracts, it is not within the power of the legislative department to make one for them. I do not know what are the facts in this case. I think the object of legislation is to give a remedy where contracts have been made by the parties themselves. I do not think that Legislatures can make contracts for the parties. Without a further examination of this subject I do not think that I can vote for it, although there may be other gentlemen in a condition to vote for it.

Mr. SWEETSER. I wish to suggest to the gentleman that this contract was entered into in direct violation of the law of Congress, which declares such contracts to be void. Shall we sit here and attempt now to ratify and confirm this class of contracts, which are made in direct violation of the law? I shall move to lay that bill upon the table.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am not for disposing of this matter thus summarily. If we can accomplish the object which the gentleman has in view, I am willing to do it. I do not see how we are to accomplish that object now. I move, then, to refer the bill to a Committee of the Whole House.

The question was then taken upon the motion, and it was agreed to.

So the bill was referred to a Committee of the Whole House.

RIGHT OF WAY AND GRANTS OF LAND TO RAILROADS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill granting the right of way and a donation of land to the State of Alabama, to aid in the construction of the Memphis and Charleston, and Selma and Gunter's Landing, and Winchester and Tennessee River railroads; which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. COBB. From the progress the hands of yonder clock are making, I am satisfied that we will not have concluded action upon this bill before the morning hour has expired, and it will go upon the Speaker's table, from whence it will never come. If I make a motion to commit this bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and to print, and that shall be the motion pending when the morning hour expires, will that bring it up the first thing to-morrow morning?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. COBB. I then make that motion.

Mr. JONES. I suppose the gentleman expects to pass this bill without its going to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COBB. I expect to pass or kill it.

Mr. JONES. I wish to ask the gentleman a question or two about the bill. A portion of the road runs through a part of my State—the Winchester and Tennessee railroad. I wish to ask the gentleman if that road will run through one foot of the public lands belonging to the United States from the town of Winchester, in Tennessee, to the town of Guntersville, in Alabama?

Mr. COBB. So much the better for the road. I am glad the gentleman called my attention to that particular fact. That road runs through a very little of the public lands.

Mr. JONES. Does it run through one foot of them?

Mr. COBB. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES. Whereabouts?

Mr. COBB. I do not know exactly. [Laughter.]

Mr. JONES. I undertake to say that it does not run through one foot of the public lands from Winchester to the Tennessee river.

Mr. COBB. I will answer that it does on Flint river.

Mr. JONES. I ask the gentleman how much all the land he expects to get for that road will be worth, if this bill passes?

Mr. COBB. To set the gentleman right before his constituents, as he expects to vote against the bill, I will tell his constituents that I expect to get very little.

Mr. JONES. All the public land which the gentleman expects to get within twenty miles of the road, I undertake to say, is not worth $1,000.

Mr. COBB. The people ask that the bill shall pass.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman from Alabama comes and asks the Government to pass a law giving the right of way and alternate sections of land to a railroad which is never to run through one foot of the public lands, nor is it to get one section of land that is worth ten cents an acre.

Mr. COBB. This is a simple link in the great chain of railroads which connect these different parts of the country.

Mr. JONES. Another one is the Memphis and Charleston railroad. I wish to ask the gentleman how much of the public land that road will run through?

Mr. COBB. It runs through a country where there have been public lands. [Laughter.] In some instances it will get mountain lands, which will prove of service to the road.

Mr. JONES. This road is to commence at Memphis, in Tennessee, upon the Mississippi river, and so far as it runs in that State there is not one foot of public land upon it.

Mr. COBB. That is the fact.

Mr. JONES. When it leaves the State of Tennessee and runs into the State of Mississippi, there is not one foot of the public land, nor never was in that part of the State belonging to the General Government. By treaty, the Chickasaw Indians in North Mississippi ceded their lands to the Government to be sold for their benefit, and not for the benefit of the Government. It enters the State of Alabama, in Franklin county, and runs parallel with the Tennessee river along the Muscle Shoals. It runs through a country where this Government, some twenty years ago, or more, ceded some 400,000 acres of land to the State of Alabama for the improvement of the Muscle Shoals, and they took all the land which was then in that region, that was worth one cent. When this road leaves the Tennessee river, it runs through Madison county, one of the wealthiest and most thickly-settled counties in the State of Alabama, where the lands of much value have been taken up for thirty-five years at least, and when it gets out of Alabama, it goes into Tennessee, along the Tennessee river, where there is not a foot of public land.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I should like to know why the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Jones] objects to this bill, if it effects nothing? For this reason I think he had better let it pass. It is evident now that that committee have a few reams of blank bills printed with these provisions in them, and I do not think they can avoid reporting that kind of bill, and when one comes that cannot do any harm, why not let it pass?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. One very good reason, which is at least satisfactory to my mind, why I do not want these bills to pass is, that if they should, when other bills are brought in here running through public lands, and ceding away those lands to railroads, those opposed to them will be pointed to the bill of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Cobb,] giving a right of way to the Winchester and Tennessee and Memphis and South Carolina railroad, and the other railroads, seven in number, I believe, which are referred to in this bill. It is for this reason that I opposed such a bald humbug as this is. It is merely to be placed upon the statute-book, to be brought up in judgment against members of this House, who may represent the parts of country where these roads are proposed to be constructed. It is the merest humbug to put such a bill upon the statute books of the country.

Mr. COBB then occupied the floor, in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Jones,] and showing the importance of the roads provided for in the bill, as connecting the avenues of commerce between the several States. His remarks were in favor of the immediate passage of the bill. He concluded by moving to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands. [His speech is published in the Appendix.]

Mr. LETCHER. Before the gentleman makes that motion, I wish to propound a single question to the gentleman.

Mr. CARTTER. I ask the Speaker if the morning hour has not expired?

The SPEAKER. It has not yet expired.

Mr. CARTTER. I desire to know if it is in order to move to commit this bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It is in order, if the gentleman can get the floor for that purpose. The gentleman from Alabama still holds the floor.

Mr. CARTTER. Well, I hope the motion to recommit to the Committee on Public Lands will be voted down.

Mr. COBB. I desire to know if my motion to recommit the bill has been received?

The SPEAKER. It has been entered upon the Journal.

Mr. COBB. Then I will hear the interrogatory of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER.]

Mr. LETCHER. The gentleman from Alabama seems to be very much interested in behalf of his constituents, in relation to this bill. I desire to know how many of them have petitioned for it?

Mr. COBB. The Legislature of the State of Alabama has petitioned, and repeatedly petitioned, for all the aid I have asked for in relation to any of the railroads in that State.

Mr. LETCHER. If the gentleman will call upon the Clerk to read the petition upon which this bill is founded, he will find that it is in the name of W. R. W. COBB, on behalf of the people of Alabama, and I do not know but all the rest of mankind besides. [Laughter.]

Mr. COBB. My constituents have petitioned for this road. Memorial after memorial has come up to this body, asking Congress to give land to this identical road.

Mr. NABERS. I wish to say to the gentleman from Alabama, that as a portion of this road passes through a section of country in which my constituents are interested, I desire at some time to be heard upon the subject. I hope, therefore, he will make such a motion as will give me an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. COBB. I have moved to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands, and it will come up to-morrow.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. The morning hour having now expired, I desire to call up the bill to which I alluded this morning.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has not yet expired.

Mr. BAYLY. Well, it has nearly expired, and I claim the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Cobb] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CARTTER. I want to know how the gentleman from Alabama can retain the floor after he has finished his speech and made his motion?

The SPEAKER. It is for the House to determine his course. He is entitled to the floor.

Mr. COBB. I will not proceed further at present, though I wish to say to the gentleman, that I decline to go on with my speech, out of courtesy to the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. NABERS. I ask the gentleman from Alabama now to yield me the floor, in order that I may hold it when the question comes up again.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot hold it.

Mr. COBB. Then I decline to yield the floor.

Mr. BAYLY. I believe the morning hour is now up to a second.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired.

BRAZILIAN INDEMNITY.

Mr. BAYLY. I now desire the unanimous consent of the House to take up the Senate bill to which I alluded, and the character of which I briefly explained this morning. I will say to the House, that the bill passed the Senate unanimously; that the Committee on Foreign Affairs of this House agreed unanimously to recommend its passage, and that, unless it passes this House to-day, it will do no good, because we have made an amendment which must go to the Senate, and must be passed there either to-day or to-morrow. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take it up and pass it.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I wish to say that the character of the bill is not such as I supposed when I objected this morning. I have no objection to its introduction.

There being no objection, the bill from the Senate, No. 451, amendatory of the act entitled "An act to carry into effect the convention between the United States and the Emperor of Brazil," approved March 29, 1850, was taken up from the Speaker's table.

Mr. BAYLY explained the character of the bill, and the necessity for its passage at once. He concluded by saying:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs have proposed an amendment reducing the time within which notice is to be given from thirty to five days, so that nobody can complain of unreasonable delay. I move the previous question.

The previous question received a second, and the main question was ordered to be put.

The question first being upon the adoption of the amendment reported by the committee, it was read as follows:

Provided, however, That any party who shall desire to avail himself of the provisions of the said eighth section, shall notify the Secretary of the Treasury thereof, within five days from the passage of this act, or from the date of said award of the commissioner to adjust the claim against Brazil.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the amendment, and it was agreed to.

The question next being upon ordering the amendment to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time, it was put and agreed to; and being accordingly engrossed, the bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. BARRERE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as correctly enrolled, bills of the following titles:

An act for the relief of the heirs of John Jackson;

A joint resolution, accepting from Giuseppe Fagnani a portrait of Henry Clay, and ordering it to be placed in the Library of Congress; and

An act to amend an act entitled "An act for the punishment of crimes in the District of Columbia."

Which bills thereupon severally received the signature of the Speaker.

Mr. JENKINS. The Committee on Public Lands—

Mr. ASHE, (interrupting.) I wish to inquire of the Chair if the consideration of the contested-election case from Pennsylvania is not the regular order of business?

The SPEAKER. It is, if called up by the gentleman.

Mr. JENKINS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution, which will require but a single moment. The Committee on Public Lands have occupied five months in delivering itself of reports, to the exclusion of the reports of all other Committees in this House. The next committee in order to be called is the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads; and for the purpose of allowing that committee to have a little respite, and other committees to come forward to make reports, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the resolution which I send to the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read for information.

The resolution was then read, as follows:

Resolved, That when reports of committees shall next after to-day be called for, such call shall begin with the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and that subsequent calls for reports shall be continued as specified in the twenty-fifth rule, subject to the special order of the House in relation to reports of committees, made on the 24th of May last. This special order shall continue in force until all the committees shall have been called once, and no longer.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I shall be forced to object.

The SPEAKER. The introduction of the resolution is objected to.

Mr. JENKINS. I move that the rules of the House be suspended, for the purpose of introducing that resolution. And I would remark, that the special order referred to in the resolution is the order introduced by the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] and this order is made subject to that.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ASHE] insists upon the consideration of his privileged question, it—

The SPEAKER. It supersedes the motion made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. JENKINS,]

Mr. JENKINS. I hope the gentleman from North Carolina will not insist upon his call.

Mr. HOUSTON. I trust the gentleman will insist upon it.

Mr. ASHE. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The consideration of the contested-election case from Pennsylvania is the first business in order, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROSS] has the floor upon that question.

Mr. ROSS addressed the House an hour, in an argument to show that the contestant was entitled to the seat. [Mr. R.'s speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. BARRERE controverted the conclusions of the majority report, returning the election to the people, and maintained that the sitting member was entitled to hold his seat.

Mr. FULLER controverted some of the conclusions of his colleague, [Mr. ROSS.]

[These remarks will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. ASHE then obtained the floor, and moved the previous question on the adoption of the report; which was seconded. Pending the ordering of the main question,

On motion by Mr. ALLISON, the House adjourned until to-morrow.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. SIBLEY gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a joint resolution to-morrow, or at some subsequent day, for the purchase of the "Half-Breed tract," on Lake Pepin, in Minnesota Territory.

PETITIONS, &c.

The following petitions, memorials, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. FAULKNER: The memorial of Captain Thomas Jordan, assistant quartermaster of the United States Army, praying to be allowed certain credits in his settlement with the accounting officers of the Treasury Department.

By Mr. APPLETON, of Massachusetts: The petition of John Winslow, Edward Winslow, and others, asking compensation for the revolutionary services of Deputy Paymaster General John Winslow.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, June 29, 1852.

Prayer by the Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

Mr. HUNTER. A rumor has just reached us, Mr. President, that Mr. CLAY is no more. His colleague is absent, rendering the last offices of friendship to the illustrious dead. I therefore move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 29, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

DEATH OF HENRY CLAY—ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. VENABLE. In consequence of a report, which may be true, that HENRY CLAY, the illustrious Senator from Kentucky, breathed his last at his lodgings, a few moments since, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to, and the House adjourned until to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, June 30, 1852.

DEATH OF THE HON. HENRY CLAY.

The anticipated formal announcement of the death of the Hon. HENRY CLAY brought together an unusual auditory. Members of the House of Representatives intermingled with Senators; the representatives of foreign sovereigns paid the tribute of their presence; Cabinet ministers, and heads of bureaus, and members of the judiciary, clustered without the bar. Of the illustrious contemporaries of the distinguished dead but few remain; but one form attracted all eyes—the honorable Secretary of State, Daniel Webster, sat there. The General-in-Chief of the Army, Major General Scott, too, was present. Attorney General Crittenden, long the colleague of the deceased; the Hon. Reverdy Johnson, a contemporary in the Senate, and one of the Attorney General's predecessors; and numerous others, as eminent for their eloquence and their genius, there contemplated the end of human greatness.

The Chaplain to the Senate, the Rev. C. M. BUTLER, in his opening prayer, supplicated for the living; but he also afforded Christian consolation by speaking hopefully of the dead, whose declining days were cheered by the Gospel dispensation.

The Journal having been read—

Mr. UNDERWOOD rose and said: Mr. President, I rise to announce the death of my colleague, Mr. CLAY. He died at his lodgings, in the National Hotel of this city, at seventeen minutes past eleven o'clock yesterday morning, in the seventy-sixth year of his age. He expired with perfect composure, and without a groan or struggle.

By his death our country has lost one of its most eminent citizens and statesmen; and, I think, its greatest genius. I shall not detain the Senate by narrating the transactions of his long and useful life. His distinguished services as a statesman are inseparably connected with the history of his country. As Representative and Speaker in the other House of Congress, as Senator in this body, as Secretary of State, and as Envoy abroad, he has, in all these positions, exhibited a wisdom and patriotism which have made a deep and lasting impression upon the grateful hearts of his countrymen. His thoughts and his actions have already been published to the world in written biography; in Congressional debates and reports; in the journals of the two Houses; and in the pages of American history. They have been commemorated by monuments erected on the wayside. They have been engraven on medals of gold. Their memory will survive the monuments of marble and the medals of gold; for these are effaced and decay by the friction of ages. But the thoughts and actions of my late colleague have become identified with the immortality of the human mind, and will pass down from generation to generation as a portion of our national inheritance incapable of annihilation so long as genius has an admirer, or liberty a friend.

Mr. President, the character of HENRY CLAY was formed and developed by the influence of our free institutions. His physical, mental, and moral faculties were the gift of God. That they were greatly superior to the faculties allotted to most men cannot be questioned. They were not cultivated, improved, and directed by a liberal or collegiate education. His respectable parents were not wealthy, and had not the means of maintaining their children at college. Moreover, his father died when he was a boy. At an early period, Mr. CLAY was thrown upon his own resources, without patrimony. He grew up in a clerk's office in Richmond, Virginia. He there studied law. He emigrated from his native State and settled in Lexington, Kentucky, where he commenced the practice of his profession before he was of full age.

The road to wealth, to honor, and fame was open before him. Under our Constitution and laws he might freely employ his great faculties unobstructed by legal impediments, and unaided by exclusive privileges. Very soon Mr. CLAY made a deep and favorable impression upon the people among whom he began his career. The excellence of his natural faculties was soon displayed. Necessity stimulated him in their cultivation. His assiduity, skill, and fidelity in professional engagements secured public confidence. He was elected member of the Legislature of Kentucky, in which body he served several sessions prior to 1806. In that year he was elevated to a seat in the Senate of the United States.

At the bar and in the General Assembly of Kentucky Mr. CLAY first manifested those high qualities as a public speaker which have secured to him so much popular applause and admiration. His physical and mental organization eminently qualified him to become a great and impressive orator. His person was tall, slender, and commanding. His temperament ardent, fearless, and full of hope. His countenance clear, expressive, and variable—indicating the emotion which predominated at the moment with exact similitude. His voice, cultivated and modulated in harmony with the sentiment he desired to express, fell upon the ear like the melody of enrapturing music. His eye beaming with intelligence and flashing with coruscations of genius. His gestures and attitudes graceful and natural. These personal advantages won the prepossessions of an audience, even before his intellectual powers began to move his hearers; and when his strong common sense, his profound reasoning, his clear conceptions of his subject in all its bearings, and his striking and beautiful illustrations, united with such personal qualities, were brought to the discussion of any question, his audience was enraptured, convinced, and led by the orator as if enchanted by the lyre of Orpheus.

No man was ever blessed by his Creator with faculties of a higher order of excellence than those given to Mr. CLAY. In the quickness of his perceptions, and the rapidity with which his conclusions were formed, he had few equals and no superior. He was eminently endowed with a nice discriminating taste for order, symmetry, and beauty. He detected in a moment everything out of place or deficient in his room, upon his farm, in his own or the dress of others. He was a skillful judge of the form and qualities of his domestic animals, which he delighted to raise on his farm. I could give you instances of the quickness and minuteness of his keen faculty of observation which never overlooked anything. A want of neatness and order was offensive to him. He was particular and neat in his handwriting, and his apparel. A slovenly blot or negligence of any sort met his condemnation; while he was so organized that he attended to, and arranged little things to please and gratify his natural love for neatness, order, and beauty, his great intellectual faculties grasped all the subjects of jurisprudence and politics with a facility amounting almost to intuition. As a lawyer, he stood at the head of his profession. As a statesman, his stand at the head of the Republican Whig party for nearly half a century, establishes his title to preeminence among his illustrious associates.

Mr. CLAY was deeply versed in all the springs of human action. He had read and studied biography and history. Shortly after I left college, I had occasion to call on him in Frankfort, where he was attending court, and well I remember to have found him with Plutarch's Lives in his hands.

No one better than he knew how to avail himself of human motives, and all the circumstances which surrounded a subject, or could present them with more force and skill to accomplish the object of an argument.

Mr. CLAY, throughout his public career, was influenced by the loftiest patriotism. Confident in the truth of his convictions and the purity of his purposes, he was ardent, sometimes impetuous, in the pursuit of objects which he believed essential to the general welfare. Those who stood in his way were thrown aside without fear or ceremony. He never affected a courtier's deference to men or opinions which he thought hostile to the best interests of his country; and hence he may have wounded the vanity of those who thought themselves of consequence. It is certain, whatever the cause, that at one period of his life Mr. CLAY might have been referred to as proof that there is more truth than fiction in those profound lines of the poet—

"He who ascends the mountain top shall find
Its loftiest peaks most wrapt in clouds and snow;
He who surpasses or subdues mankind,
Must look down on the hate of those below,
Though far above the sun of glory glow.
And far beneath the earth and ocean spread,
Round him are icy rocks, and loudly blow
Contending tempests on his naked head,
And thus reward the toils which to those summits led."

Calumny and detraction emptied their vials upon him. But how glorious the change! He out-lived malice and envy. He lived long enough to prove to the world that his ambition was no more than a holy aspiration to make his country the greatest, most powerful, and best governed on the earth. If he desired its highest office, it was because the greater power and influence resulting from such elevation would enable him to do more than he otherwise could for the progress and advancement—first of his own countrymen, then of his whole race. His sympathies embraced all. The African slave, the Creole of Spanish America, the children of renovated classic Greece—all families of men, without respect to color or clime, found in his expanded bosom and comprehensive intellect a friend of their elevation and amelioration. Such ambition as that, is God's implantation in the human heart for raising the down-trodden nations of the earth, and fitting them for regenerated existence in politics, in morals, and religion.

Bold and determined as Mr. CLAY was in all his actions, he was, nevertheless, conciliating. He did not obstinately adhere to things impracticable. If he could not accomplish the best, he contented himself with the highest approach to it. He has been the great compromiser of those political agitations and opposing opinions which have, in the belief of thousands, at different times, endangered the perpetuity of our Federal Government and Union.

Mr. CLAY was no less remarkable for his admirable social qualities than for his intellectual abilities. As a companion, he was the delight of his friends; and no man ever had better or truer. They have loved him from the beginning, and loved him to the last. His hospitable mansion at Ashland was always open to their reception. No guest ever thence departed without feeling happier for his visit. But, alas! that hospitable mansion has already been converted into a house of mourning; already has intelligence of his death passed with electric velocity to that aged and now widowed lady who, for more than fifty years, bore to him all the endearing relations of wife, and whose feeble condition prevented her from joining him in this city, and soothing the anguish of life's last scene by those endearing attentions which no one can give so well as woman and a wife. May God infuse into her heart and mind the Christian spirit of submission under her bereavement! It cannot be long before she may expect a reunion in Heaven. A nation condole with her and her children on account of their irreparable loss.

Mr. CLAY, from the nature of his disease, declined very gradually. He bore his protracted sufferings with great equanimity and patience. On one occasion he said to me that when death was inevitable and must soon come, and when the sufferer was ready to die, he did not perceive the wisdom of praying to be "delivered from sudden death." He thought under such circumstances the sooner suffering was relieved by death the better. He desired the termination of his own sufferings, while he acknowledged the duty of patiently waiting and abiding the pleasure of God. Mr. CLAY frequently spoke to me of his hope of eternal life, founded upon the merits of Jesus Christ as a saviour; who, as he remarked, came into the world to bring "life and immortality to light." He was a member of the Episcopal Church. In one of our conversations he told me, that as his hour of dissolution approached, he found that his affections were concentrating more and more upon his domestic circle—his wife and children. In my daily visits he was in the habit of asking me to detail to him the transactions of the Senate. This I did, and he manifested much interest in passing occurrences. His inquiries were less frequent as his end approached. For the week preceding his death he seemed to be altogether abstracted from the concerns of the world. When he became so low that he could not converse without being fatigued, he frequently requested those around him to converse. He would then quietly listen. He retained his mental faculties in great perfection. His memory remained perfect. He frequently mentioned events and conversations of recent occurrence, showing that he had a perfect recollection of what was said and done. He said to me that he was grateful to God for continuing to him the blessing of reason which enabled him to contemplate and reflect on his situation. He manifested during his confinement the same characteristics which marked his conduct through the vigor of his life. He was exceedingly averse to give his friends "trouble," as he called it. Some time before he knew it, we commenced waiting through the night in an adjoining room. He said to me after passing a painful day, "perhaps some one had better remain all night in the parlor." From this time he knew some friend was constantly at hand ready to attend to him.

Mr. President, the majestic form of Mr. CLAY will no more grace these Halls. No more shall we hear that voice which has so often thrilled and charmed the assembled representatives of the American people. No more shall we see that waving hand and eye of light, as when he was engaged unfolding his policy in regard to the varied interests of our growing and mighty republican empire. His voice is silent on earth forever. The darkness of death has obscured the luster of his eye. But the memory of his services—not only to his beloved Kentucky, not only to the United States, but for the cause of human freedom and progress throughout the world—will live through future ages, as a bright example, stimulating and encouraging his own countrymen and the people of all nations in their patriotic devotions to country and humanity.

With Christians, there is yet a nobler and a higher thought in regard to Mr. CLAY. They will think of him in connection with eternity. They will contemplate his immortal spirit occupying its true relative magnitude among the moral stars of glory in the presence of God. They will think of him as having fulfilled the duties allotted to him on earth, having been regenerated by Divine grace, and having passed through the valley of the shadow of death, and reached an everlasting and happy home in that "house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

On Sunday morning last, I was watching alone at Mr. CLAY's bedside. For the last hour he had been unusually quiet, and I thought he was sleeping. In that, however, he told me I was mistaken. Opening his eyes and looking at me, he said, "Mr. UNDERWOOD, there may be some question where my remains shall be buried. Some persons may designate Frankfort. I wish to repose at the cemetery in Lexington, where many of my friends and connections are buried." My reply was, "I will endeavor to have your wish executed."

I now ask the Senate to have his corpse transmitted to Lexington, Kentucky, for sepulture. Let him sleep with the dead of that city, in and near which his home has been for more than half a century. For the people of Lexington, the living and the dead, he manifested, by the statement made to me, a pure and holy sympathy, and a desire to cleave unto them, as strong as that which bound Ruth to Naomi. It was his anxious wish to return to them before he died, and to realize what the daughter of Moab so strongly felt and beautifully expressed: "Thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God. Where thou diest will I die, and there will I be buried."

It is fit that the tomb of HENRY CLAY should be in the city of Lexington. In our Revolution, liberty's first libation blood was poured out in a town of that name in Massachusetts. On hearing it, the pioneers of Kentucky consecrated the name, and applied it to the place where Mr. CLAY desired to be buried. The associations connected with the name harmonize with his character; and the monument erected to his memory at the spot selected by him will be visited by the votaries of genius and liberty with that reverence which is inspired at the tomb of Washington. Upon that monument let his epitaph be engraved.

Mr. President, I have availed myself of Doctor Johnson's paraphrase of the epitaph on Thomas Hanmer, with a few alterations and additions, to express in borrowed verse my admiration for the life and character of Mr. CLAY, and with this heart-tribute to the memory of my illustrious colleague I conclude my remarks:

Born when Freedom her stripes and stars unfurled,
When Revolution shook the startled world—
Heroes and sages taught his brilliant mind
To know and love the rights of all mankind.
"In life's first bloom his public toils began,
At once commenced the Senator and man:
In business dextrous, weighty in debate,
Near fifty years he labored for the State.
In every speech persuasive wisdom flowed,
In every act refulgent virtue glowed;
Suspended faction ceased from rage and strife,
To hear his eloquence and praise his life.
Resistless merit fixed the Members' choice,
Who hailed him Speaker with united voice."
His talents ripening with advancing years—
His wisdom growing with his public cares—
A chosen envoy, war's dark horrors cease,
And tides of carnage turn to streams of peace.
Conflicting principles, internal strife,
Tariff and slavery, disunion rife,
All are compromised by his great hand,
And beams of joy illuminate the land.
Patriot, Christian, Husband, Father, Friend,
Thy work of life achieved a glorious end!

I offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, That a committee of six be appointed by the President of the Senate, to take order for superintending the funeral of HENRY CLAY, late a member of this body, which will take place to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m., and that the Senate will attend the same.

Resolved, That the members of the Senate, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, will go into mourning for one month by the usual mode of wearing crape on the left arm.

Resolved, As a further mark of respect entertained by the Senate for the memory of HENRY CLAY, and his long and distinguished services to his country, that his remains, in pursuance of the known wishes of his family, be removed to the place of sepulture selected by himself at Lexington, in Kentucky, in charge of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and attended by a committee of six Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, who shall have full power to carry this resolution into effect.

Mr. CASS. Mr. President, again has an impressive warning come to teach us, that in the midst of life, we are in death. The ordinary labors of this Hall are suspended, and its contentions hushed, before the power of Him, who says to the storm of human passion, as He said of old to the waves of Galilee, PEACE, BE STILL. The lessons of His providence, severe as they may be, often become merciful dispensations, like that which is now spreading sorrow through the land, and which is reminding us that we have higher duties to fulfill, and graver responsibilities to encounter, than those that meet us here, when we lay our hands upon His Holy Word, and invoke His holy name, promising to be faithful to that Constitution, which He gave us in his mercy, and will withdraw only in the hour of our blindness and disobedience, and of His own wrath.

Another great man has fallen in our land, ripe indeed in years and in honors, but never dearer to the American people than when called from the theater of his services and renown to that final bar where the lofty and the lowly must all meet at last.

I do not rise, upon this mournful occasion, to indulge in the language of panegyric. My regard for the memory of the dead, and for the obligations of the living, would equally rebuke such a course. The severity of truth is at once our proper duty and our best consolation. Born during the revolutionary struggle, our deceased associate was one of the few remaining public men who connect the present generation with the actors in the trying scenes of that eventful period, and whose names and deeds will soon be known only in the history of their country. He was another illustration, and a noble one, too, of the glorious equality of our institutions, which freely offer all their rewards to all who justly seek them; for he was the architect of his own fortune, having made his way in life by self-exertion, and he was an early adventurer in the great forests of the West, then a world of primitive vegetation, but now the abode of intelligence and religion, of prosperity and civilization. But he possessed that intellectual superiority which overcomes surrounding obstacles, and which local seclusion cannot long withhold from general knowledge and appreciation.

It is almost half a century since he passed through Chillicothe, then the seat of government of Ohio, where I was a member of the Legislature, on his way to take his place in this very body, which is now listening to this reminiscence, and to a feeble tribute of regard from one who then saw him for the first time, but who can never forget the impression he produced by the charms of his conversation, the frankness of his manner, and the high qualities with which he was endowed. Since then he has belonged to his country, and has taken a part, and a prominent part, both in peace and war, in all the great questions affecting her interest and her honor; and though it has been my fortune often to differ from him, yet I believe he was as pure a patriot as ever participated in the councils of a nation, anxious for the public good, and seeking to promote it, during all the vicissitudes of a long and eventful life. That he exercised a powerful influence, within the sphere of his action, through the whole country indeed, we all feel and know; and we know, too, the eminent endowments which gave him this distinction. Frank and fearless in the expression of his opinion, and in the performance of his duties, with rare powers of eloquence, which never failed to rivet the attention of his auditory, and which always commanded admiration, even when they did not carry conviction—prompt in decision, and firm in action, and with a vigorous intellect, trained in the contests of a stirring life, and strengthened by enlarged experience and observation, joined withal to an ardent love of country, and to great purity of purpose,—these were the elements of his power and success, and we dwell upon them with mournful gratification now, when we shall soon follow him to the cold and silent tomb, where we shall commit "earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust," but with the blessed conviction of the truth of that divine revelation which teaches us that there is life and hope beyond the narrow house, where we shall leave him alone to the mercies of his God and ours.

He has passed beyond the reach of human praise or censure; but the judgment of his contemporaries has preceded and pronounced the judgment of history, and his name and fame will shed luster upon his country, and will be proudly cherished in the hearts of his countrymen for long ages to come. Yes; they will be cherished and freshly remembered, when these marble columns that surround us, so often the witnesses of his triumph—but, in a few brief hours, when his mortal frame, despoiled of the immortal spirit, shall rest under this dome for the last time, to become the witnesses of his defeat in that final contest where the mightiest fall before the great destroyer—when these marble columns shall themselves have fallen, like all the works of man, leaving their broken fragments to tell the story of former magnificence, amid the very ruins which announce decay and desolation.

I was often with him during his last illness, when the world and the things of the world were fast fading away before him. He knew that the silver cord was almost loosened, and that the golden bowl was breaking at the fountain; but he was resigned to the will of Providence, feeling that He who gave has the right to take away in His own good time and manner. After his duty to his Creator, and his anxiety for his family, his first care was for his country, and his first wish for the preservation and perpetuation of the Constitution and the Union—dear to him in the hour of death, as they had ever been in the vigor of life! Of that Constitution and Union, whose defense in the last and greatest crisis of their peril, had called forth all his energies, and stimulated those memorable and powerful exertions, which he, who witnessed, can never forget, and which no doubt, hastened the final catastrophe a nation now deplores with a sincerity and unanimity, not less honorable to themselves than to the memory of the object of their affections. And when we shall enter that narrow valley through which he has passed before us, and which leads to the judgment-seat of God, may we be able to say, through faith in his Son, our Saviour, and in the beautiful language of the hymn of the dying Christian—dying, but ever living and triumphant—

"The world recedes, it disappears—
Heaven opens on my eyes! my ears
With sounds seraphic ring;
Lend, lend your wings! I mount—I fly!
Oh, Grave! where is thy victory?
Oh, Death! where is thy sting?"

"Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his."

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President, we have heard, with deep sensibility, what has just fallen from the Senators who have preceded me. We have heard, sir, the voice of Kentucky—and, upon this occasion, she had a right to speak—in mingled accents of pride and sorrow; for it has rarely fallen to the lot of any State to lament the loss of such a son. But Virginia, too, is entitled to her place in this procession; for she cannot be supposed to be unmindful of the tie which bound her to the dead. When the earth opens to receive the mortal part which she gave to man, it is then that affection is eager to bury in its bosom every recollection but those of love and kindness. And, sir, when the last sensible tie is about to be severed, it is then that we look with anxious interest to the deeds of the life, and to the emanations of the heart and the mind, for those more enduring monuments which are the creation of an immortal nature.

In this instance, we can be at no loss for these. This land, sir, is full of the monuments of his genius. His memory is as imperishable as American history itself, for he was one of those who made it. Sir, he belonged to that marked class who are the men of their century; for it was his rare good fortune not only to have been endowed with the capacity to do great things, but to have enjoyed the opportunities of achieving them. I know, sir, it has been said and deplored, that he wanted some of the advantages of an early education; but it, perhaps, has not been remembered that, in many respects, he enjoyed such opportunities for mental training as can rarely fall to the lot of man. He had not a chance to learn as much from books, but he had such opportunities of learning from men as few men have ever enjoyed. Sir, it is to be remembered that he was reared at a time when there was a state of society in the Commonwealth which gave him birth, such as has never been seen there before nor since. It was his early privilege to see how justice was administered by a Pendleton and a Wythe, with the last of whom he was in the daily habit of familiar intercourse. He had constant opportunities to observe how forensic questions were managed by a Marshall and a Wickham. He was old enough, too, to have heard and to have appreciated the eloquence of a Patrick Henry, and of George Keith Taylor. In short, sir, he lived in a society in which the examples of a Jefferson, and a Madison, and a Monroe were living influences, and on which the setting sun of a Washington cast the mild effulgence of its departing rays.

He was trained, too, as has been well said by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. Cass,] at a period when the recent revolutionary struggle had given a more elevated tone to patriotism and imparted a higher cast to public feeling and to public character. Such lessons were worth, perhaps, more to him than the whole encyclopedia of scholastic learning. Not only were the circumstances of his early training favorable to the development of his genius, but the theater upon which he was thrown, was eminently propitious for its exercise. The circumstances of the early settlement of Kentucky, the generous, daring, and reckless character of the people—all fitted it to be the theater for the display of those commanding qualities of heart and mind, which he so eminently possessed. There can be little doubt but that those people and their chosen leader exercised a mutual influence upon each other; and no one can be surprised that with his brave spirit and commanding eloquence, and fascinating address, he should have led not only there but elsewhere.

I did not know him, Mr. President, as you did, in the freshness of his prime, or in the full maturity of his manhood. I did not hear him, sir, as you have heard him, when his voice roused the spirit of his countrymen for war—when he cheered the drooping, when he rallied the doubting through all the vicissitudes of a long and doubtful contest. I have never seen him, sir, when, from the height of the chair, he ruled the House of Representatives by the energy of his will, or when upon the level of the floor he exercised a control almost as absolute, by the mastery of his intellect. When I first knew him, his sun had a little passed its zenith. The effacing hand of time had just begun to touch the lineaments of his manhood. But yet, sir, I saw enough of him to be able to realize what he might have been in the prime of his strength, and in the full vigor of his maturity. I saw him, sir, as you did, when he led the "Opposition" during the administration of Mr. Van Buren. I had daily opportunities of witnessing the exhibition of his powers during the extra session under Mr. Tyler's administration. And I saw, as we all saw, in a recent contest, the exhibition of power on his part, which was most marvelous in one of his years.

Mr. President, he may not have had as much of analytic skill, as some others, in dissecting a subject. It may be, perhaps, that he did not seek to look quite so far ahead as some who have been most distinguished for political forecast. But it may be truly said of Mr. CLAY, that he was no exaggerator. He looked at events through neither end of the telescope, but surveyed them with the natural and the naked eye. He had the capacity of seeing things as the people saw them, and of feeling things as the people felt them. He had, sir, beyond any other man whom I have ever seen, the true mesmeric touch of the orator—the rare art of transferring his impulses to others. Thoughts, feelings, emotions, came from the ready mould of his genius, radiant and glowing, and communicated their own warmth to every heart which received them. His, too, was the power of wielding the higher and intenser forms of passion with a majesty and an ease, which none but the great masters of the human heart can ever employ. It was his rare good fortune to have been one of those who form, as it were, a sensible link and a living tradition which connects one age with another, and through which one generation speaks its thoughts and feelings, and appeals to another. And, unfortunate is it for a country, when it ceases to possess such men, for it is to them that we chiefly owe the capacity to maintain the unity of the great Epos of human history, and preserve the consistency of political action.

Sir, it may be said that the grave is still new-made which covers the mortal remains of one of those great men who have been taken from our midst, and the earth is soon to open to receive another. I know not, sir, whether it can be said to be a matter of lamentation, so far as the dead are concerned, that the thread of this life has been clipped when once it had been fully spun. They escape the infirmities of age, and they leave an imperishable name behind them. The loss, sir, is not theirs, but ours; and a loss the more to be lamented that we see none to fill the places thus made vacant on the stage of public affairs. But it may be well for us, who have much more cause to mourn and to lament such deaths, to pause amidst the business of life for the purpose of contemplating the spectacle before us, and of drawing the moral from the passing event. It is when death seizes for its victims those who are, by "a head and shoulders, taller than all the rest," that we feel most deeply the uncertainty of human affairs, and that "the glories of our mortal state are shadows, not substantial things." It is, sir, in such instances as the present that we can best study by the light of example the true object of life, and the wisest ends of human pursuit.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I hope I shall not be considered obtrusive, if on this occasion for a brief moment, I mingle my humble voice with those that, with an ability that I shall neither attempt nor hope to equal, have sought to do justice to the worth and memory of the deceased, and at the same time appropriately to minister to the sympathies and sorrows of a stricken people. Sir, it is the teaching of inspiration that "no man liveth and no man dieth unto himself."

There is a lesson taught no less in the death than in the life of every man—eminently so in the case of one who has filled a large space and occupied a distinguished position in the thoughts and regard of his fellow-men. Particularly instructive at this time is the event which we now deplore, although the circumstances attending his decease are such as are calculated to assuage rather than aggravate the grief which it must necessarily cause. His time had fully come. The three score and ten marking the ordinary period of human life had for some years been passed, and, full of years and of honors, he has gone to his rest. And now, when the nation is marshaling itself for the contest which is to decide "who shall be greatest," as if to chasten our ambition, to restrain and subdue the violence of passion, to moderate our desires and elevate our hopes, we have the spectacle of one who, by the force of his intellect and the energy of his own purpose, had achieved a reputation which the highest official honors of the Republic might have illustrated, but could not have enhanced, laid low in death—as if, at the very outset of this political contest, on which the nation is now entering, to teach the ambitious and aspiring the end of human pursuit and earthly honor. But, sir, I do not intend to dwell on that moral which is taught by the silent lips and closed eye of the illustrious dead, with a force such as no man ever spoke with; but I shall leave the event, with its silent and mute eloquence, to impress its own appropriate teachings on the heart.

In the long and eventful life of Mr. CLAY, in the various positions which he occupied, in the many posts of public duty which he filled, in the many exhibitions which his history affords of untiring energy, of unsurpassed eloquence, and of devoted patriotism, it would be strange indeed if different minds, as they dwell upon the subject, were all to select the same incidents of his life as preëminently calculated to challenge admiration and respect.

Sir, my admiration—ay, my affection for Mr. CLAY—was won and secured many years since, even in my school-boy days—when his voice of counsel, encouragement, and sympathy was heard in the other Hall of this Capitol, in behalf of the struggling colonies of the southern portion of this continent, who, in pursuit of their inalienable rights, in imitation of our own forefathers, had unfurled the banner of liberty, and, regardless of consequences, had gallantly rushed into that contest where "life is lost, or freedom won." And again, sir, when Greece, rich in the memories of the past, awoke from the slumber of ages of oppression and centuries of shame, and resolved "To call her virtues back, and conquer time and fate"—there, over the plains of that classic land, above the din of battle and the clash of arms, mingling with the shouts of the victors and the groans of the vanquished, were heard the thrilling and stirring notes of that same eloquence, excited by a sympathy which knew no bounds, wide as the world, pleading the cause of Grecian liberty before the American Congress, as if to pay back to Greece the debt which every patriot and orator felt was her due. Sir, in the long and honorable career of the deceased, there are many events and circumstances upon which his friends and posterity will dwell with satisfaction and pride, but none which will preserve his memory with more enduring lustre to future ages than the course he pursued in the Spanish-American and Greek revolutions.

Mr. CLEMENS. Mr. President, I should not have thought it necessary to add anything to what has already been said, but for a request preferred by some of the friends of the deceased. I should have been content to mourn him in silence and left it to other tongues to pronounce his eulogy. What I have now to say shall be brief—very brief.

Mr. President, it is now less than three short years ago since I first entered this body. At that period it numbered among its members many of the most illustrious statesmen this Republic has ever produced, or the world has ever known. Of the living, it is not my purpose to speak; but in that brief period, death has been busy here; and, as if to mark the feebleness of human things, his arrows have been aimed at the highest, the mightiest of us all. First, died CALHOUN. And well, sir, do I remember the deep feeling evinced on that occasion by him whose death has been announced here to-day, when he said: "I was 'his senior in years—in nothing else. In the 'course of nature I ought to have preceded him. 'It has been decreed otherwise; but I know that 'I shall linger here only a short time, and shall 'soon follow him.'" It was genius mourning over his younger brother, and too surely predicting his own approaching end.

He, too, sir, is now gone from among us, and left none like him behind. That voice, whose every tone was music, is hushed and still. That clear, bright eye is dim and lusterless, and that breast, where grew and flourished every quality which could adorn and dignify our nature, is cold as the clod that soon must cover it. A few hours have wrought a mighty change—a change for which a lingering illness had, indeed, in some degree prepared us, but which, nevertheless, will still fall upon the nation with crushing force. Many a sorrowing heart is now asking, as I did yesterday, when I heard the first sound of the funeral bell—

"And is he gone?—the pure of the purest,
The hand that upheld our bright banner the surest,
Is he gone from our struggles away?
But yesterday lending a people a new life,
Cold, mute, in the coffin to-day."

Mr. President, this is an occasion when eulogy must fail to perform its office. The long life which is now ended is a history of glorious deeds too mighty for the tongue of praise. It is in the hearts of his countrymen that his best epitaph must be written. It is in the admiration of a world that his renown must be recorded. In that deep love of country which distinguished every period of his life, he may not have been unrivaled. In loftiness of intellect, he was not without his peers. The skill with which he touched every chord of the human heart may have been equaled. The iron will, the unbending firmness, the fearless courage, which marked his character, may have been shared by others. But where shall we go to find all those qualities united, concentrated, blended into one brilliant whole, and shedding a lustre upon one single head, which does not dazzle the beholder only because it attracts his love and demands his worship?

I scarcely know, sir, how far it may be allowable, upon an occasion like this, to refer to party struggles which have left wounds not yet entirely healed. I will venture, however, to suggest, that it should be a source of consolation to his friends that he lived long enough to see the full accomplishment of the last great work of his life, and to witness the total disappearance of that sectional tempest which threatened to whelm the Republic in ruins. Both the great parties of the country have agreed to stand upon the platform which he erected, and both of them have solemnly pledged themselves to maintain unimpaired the work of his hands. I doubt not the knowledge of this cheered him in his dying moments, and helped to steal away the pangs of dissolution.

Mr. President, if I knew anything more that I could say, I would gladly utter it. To me, he was something more than kind, and I am called upon to mingle a private with the public grief. I wish that I could do something to add to his fame. But he built for himself a monument of immortality, and left to his friends no task but that of soothing their own sorrow for his loss. We pay to him the tribute of our tears. More we have no power to bestow. Patriotism, honor, genius, courage, have all come to strew their garlands about his tomb; and well they may, for he was the peer of them all.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, it is not always by words that the living pay to the dead the sincerest and most eloquent tribute. The tears of a nation, flowing spontaneously over the grave of a public benefactor, is a more eloquent testimonial of his worth and of the affection and veneration of his countrymen, than the most highly-wrought eulogium of the most gifted tongue. The heart is not necessarily the fountain of words, but it is always the source of tears, whether they be of joy, gratitude, or grief. But sincere, truthful, and eloquent, as they are, they leave no permanent record of the virtues and greatness of him on whose tomb they are shed. As the dews of heaven falling at night are absorbed by the earth, or dried up by the morning sun, so the tears of a people, shed for their benefactor, disappear without leaving a trace to tell the future generations of the services, sacrifices, and virtues of him to whose memory they were a grateful tribute. But as homage paid to virtue is an incentive to it, it is right that the memory of the good, the great, and noble of the earth should be preserved and honored.

The ambition, Mr. President, of the truly great is more the hope of living in the memory and estimation of future ages than of possessing power in their own. It is this hope that stimulates them to perseverance; that enables them to encounter disappointment, ingratitude, and neglect, and to press on through toils, privations, and perils to the end. It was not the hope of discovering a world, over which he should himself exercise dominion, that sustained Columbus in all his trials. It was not for this he braved danger, disappointment, poverty, and reproach. It was not for this he subdued his native pride, wandered from kingdom to kingdom, kneeling at the feet of princes a suppliant for means to prosecute his sublime enterprise. It was not for this, after having at last secured the patronage of Isabella, that he put off in his crazy and ill-appointed fleet into unknown seas, to struggle with storms and tempests, and the rage of a mutinous crew. It was another and nobler kind of ambition that stimulated him to contend with terror, superstition, and despair, and to press forward on his perilous course, when the needle in his compass, losing its polarity, seemed to unite with the fury of the elements and the insubordination of his crew in turning him back from his perilous but glorious enterprise. It was the hope which was realized at last, when his ungrateful country was compelled to inscribe, as an epitaph on his tomb—that enabled him at first to brave so many disappointments, and at last to conquer the multitude of perils that beset his pathway on the deep. This, sir, is the ambition of the truly great—not to achieve present fame, but future immortality. This being the case, it is besting here to-day to add to the life of HENRY CLAY, the record of his death, signalized as it is by a nation's gratitude and grief. It is right that posterity should learn from us, the contemporaries of the illustrious deceased, that his virtues and services were appreciated by his country, and acknowledged by the tears of his countrymen poured out upon his grave.

"Columbus has given a new world to the kingdom of Castile and Leon,"

The career of HENRY CLAY was a wonderful one. And what an illustration of the excellence of our institutions would a retrospect of his life afford! Born in an humble station, without any of the adventitious aids of fortune by which the obstructions on the road to fame are smoothed, he rose not only to the most exalted eminence of position, but likewise to the highest place in the affections of his countrymen. Taking into view the disadvantages of his early position, disadvantages against which he had always to contend, his career is without a parallel in the history of great men. To have seen him a youth, without friends or fortune, and with but a scanty education, who would have ventured to predict for him a course so brilliant and beneficent, and a fame so well deserved and enduring? Like the pine, however, which sometimes springs up amidst the rocks on the mountain side, with scarce a crevice in which to fix its roots or soil to nourish them, but which, nevertheless, overtops all the trees of the surrounding forest, HENRY CLAY, by his own inherent, self-sustaining energy and genius, rose to an altitude of fame almost unequaled in the age in which he lived. As an orator, legislator, and statesman, he had no superior. All his faculties were remarkable, and in remarkable combination. Possessed of a brilliant genius and a fertile imagination, his judgment was sound, discriminating, and eminently practical. Of an ardent and impetuous temperament, he was nevertheless persevering and firm of purpose. Frank, bold, and intrepid, he was cautious in providing against the contingencies and obstacles which might possibly rise up in the road to success. Generous, liberal, and entertaining, broad and expanded views of national policy, in his legislative course he never transcended the limits of a wise economy.

But, Mr. President, of all his faculties, that of making friends and attaching them to him was the most remarkable and extraordinary. In this respect, he seemed to possess a sort of fascination, by which all who came into his presence were attracted towards and bound to him by ties which neither time nor circumstances had power to dissolve or weaken. In the admiration of his friends was the recognition of the divinity of intellect; in their attachment to him a confession of his generous personal qualities and social virtues.

Of the public services of Mr. CLAY, the present occasion affords no room for a sketch more extended than that which his respected colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has presented. It is, however, sufficient to say, that for more than forty years he has been a prominent actor in the drama of American affairs. During the late war with England his voice was more potent than any other in awakening the spirit of the country, infusing confidence into the people, and rendering available the resources for carrying on the contest. In our domestic controversies, threatening the peace of the country and the integrity of the Union, he has always been first to note danger as well as to suggest the means of averting it. When the waters of the great political deep were upheaved by the tempest of discord, and the ark of the Union, freighted with the hopes and destinies of freedom, tossing about on the raging billows, and drifting every moment nearer to the vortex which threatened to swallow it up, it was his clarion voice, rising above the storm, that admonished the crew of impending peril, and counseled the way to safety.

But, Mr. President, devotedly as he loved his country, his aspirations were not limited to its welfare alone. Wherever freedom had a votary, that votary had a friend in HENRY CLAY; and in the struggle of the Spanish colonies for independence he uttered words of encouragement which have become the mottoes on the banners of freedom in every land. But neither the services which he has rendered his own country, nor his wishes for the welfare of others, nor his genius, nor the affection of friends, could turn aside the destroyer. No price could purchase exemption from the common lot of humanity. HENRY CLAY, the wise, the great, the gifted, had to die; and his history is summed up in the biography which the Russian poet has prepared for all, kings and serfs, viz:

"born, living, dying,
Quitting the still shore for the troubled wave,
Struggling with storm-clouds, over shipwrecks flying,
And casting anchor in the silent grave."

But though time would not spare him, there is still this of consolation: He died peacefully and happy, ripe in renown, full of years and of honors, and rich in the affections of his country. He enjoyed, too, the unspeakable satisfaction of closing his eyes whilst the country he had loved so much and served so well was still in the enjoyment of peace, happiness, union, and prosperity—still advancing in all the elements of wealth, greatness, and power.

I know, Mr. President, how unequal I have been to the apparently self-imposed task of presenting, in an appropriate manner, the merits of the illustrious deceased. But if I had remained silent on an occasion like this, when the hearts of my constituents are swelling with grief, I would have been disowned by them. It is for this reason—that of giving utterance to their feelings as well as of my own—that I have trespassed on the time of the Senate. I would that I could have spoken fitter words; but, such as they are, they were uttered by the tongue in response to the promptings of the heart.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, fifty years ago, HENRY CLAY, of Virginia, already adopted by Kentucky, then as youthful as himself, entered the service of his country, a Representative in the unpretending Legislature of that rising State; and having thenceforward pursued, with ardor and constancy, the gradual paths of an aspiring change through Halls of Congress, foreign courts, and Executive councils, he has now, with the cheerfulness of a patriot, and the serenity of a Christian, fitly closed his long and arduous career, here in the Senate, in the full presence of the Republic, looking down upon the scene with anxiety and alarm,—not merely a Senator like one of us who yet remain in the Senate House, but filling that character which, though it had no authority of law and was assigned without suffrage, Augustus Cæsar nevertheless declared was above the title of Emperor, Primus inter Illustres—the Prince of the Senate.

Generals are tried, Mr. President, by examining the campaigns they have lost or won, and statesmen by reviewing the transactions in which they have been engaged. Hamilton would have been unknown to us had there been no Constitution to be created, as Brutus would have died in obscurity had there been no Cæsar to be slain.

Colonization, Revolution, and Organization—three great acts in the drama of our national progress—had already passed when the Western patriot appeared on the public stage. He entered in that next division of the majestic scenes which was marked by an inevitable reaction of political forces, a wild strife of factions, and ruinous embarrassments in our foreign relations. This transition stage is always more perilous than any other in the career of nations, and especially in the career of Republics. It proved fatal to the Commonwealth in England. Scarcely any of the Spanish American States has yet emerged from it; and it has more than once been sadly signalized by the ruin of the Republican cause in France.

The continuous administration of Washington and John Adams had closed under a cloud which had thrown a broad, dark shadow over the future; the nation was deeply indebted at home and abroad, and its credit was prostrate. The revolutionary factions had given place to two inveterate parties, divided by a gulf which had been worn by the conflict in which the Constitution was adopted, and made broader and deeper by a war of prejudices concerning the merits of the belligerents in the great European struggle that then convulsed the civilized world. Our extraordinary political system was little more than an ingenious theory, not yet practically established. The Union of the States was as yet only one of compact; for the political, social, and commercial necessities to which it was so marvelously adapted, and which, clustering thickly upon it, now render it indissoluble, had not then been broadly disclosed, nor had the habits of acquiescence and the sentiments of loyalty, always slow of growth, fully ripened. The bark that had gone to sea, thus unfurnished and untried, seemed quite certain to founder by reason of its own inherent frailty, even if it should escape unharmed in the great conflict of nations, which acknowledged no claims of justice, and tolerated no pretensions of neutrality. Moreover, the territory possessed by the nation was inadequate to commercial exigencies, and indispensable social expansion; and yet no provision had been made for enlargement, nor for extending the political system over distant regions, inhabited or otherwise, which must inevitably be acquired. Nor could any such acquisition be made without disturbing the carefully-adjusted balance of powers among the members of the Confederacy.

These difficulties, Mr. President, although they grew less with time and by slow degrees, continued throughout the whole life of the statesman whose obsequies we are celebrating. Be it known, then—and I am sure that history will confirm the instruction—that conservatism was the interest of the nation, and the responsibility of its rulers, during the period in which he flourished. He was ardent, bold, generous, and even ambitious; and yet, with a profound conviction of the true exigencies of the country, like Alexander Hamilton, he disciplined himself, and trained a restless nation, that knew only self-control, to the rigorous practice of that often humiliating conservatism which its welfare and security in that peculiar crisis so imperiously demanded.

It could not have happened, sir, to any citizen to have acted alone, nor even to have acted always the most conspicuous part in a trying period so long protracted. HENRY CLAY therefore shared the responsibilities of Government with not only his proper cotemporaries, but also survivors of the Revolution, as well as also many who will now succeed himself. Delicacy forbids my naming those who retain their places here; but we may, without impropriety, recall among his compeers a Senator of vast resources and inflexible resolve, who has recently withdrawn from this Chamber, but I trust not altogether from public life, (Mr. Benton); and another, who, surpassing all his cotemporaries within his country, and even throughout the world, in the proper eloquence of the forum, now, in autumnal years, for a second time, dignifies and adorns the highest seat in the Executive Council, (Mr. Webster.) Passing by these eminent and noble men, the shades of Calhoun, John Quincy Adams, Jackson, Monroe, Madison, and Jefferson, rise up before us—statesmen whose living and local fame has ripened already into historical and world-wide renown.

Among geniuses so lofty as these, HENRY CLAY bore a part in regulating the constitutional freedom of political debate; establishing that long-contested and most important line which divides the sovereignty of the several States from that of the States confederated; asserting the right of neutrality, and vindicating it by a war against Great Britain, when that just but extreme measure became necessary; adjusting the terms on which that perilous yet honorable contest was brought to a peaceful close; perfecting the Army, and the Navy, and national fortifications; settling the fiscal and financial policy of the Government in more than one crisis of apparently-threatened revolution; asserting and calling into exercise the powers of the Government for making and improving internal communications between the States; arousing and encouraging the Spanish American colonies on this continent to throw off the foreign yoke, and to organize governments on principles congenial to our own, and thus creating external bulwarks for our own national defense; establishing equal and impartial peace and amity with all existing maritime Powers; and extending the constitutional organization of government over the vast regions all secured in his lifetime by purchase or by conquest, whereby the pillars of the Republic have been removed from the banks of the St. Mary's to the borders of the Rio Grande, and from the margin of the Mississippi to the Pacific coast. We may not yet discuss the wisdom of the several measures which have thus passed in review before us, nor of the positions which the deceased statesman assumed in regard to them, but we may without offense dwell upon the comprehensive results of them all.

The Union exists in absolute integrity, and the Republic in complete and triumphant development. Without having relinquished any part of their individuality, the States have more than doubled already, and are increasing in numbers and growing in political strength and expansion more rapidly than ever before. Without having absorbed any State, or having even encroached on any State, the Confederation has opened itself so as to embrace all the new members who have come, and now, with capacity for further and indefinite enlargement, has become fixed, enduring, and perpetual. Although it was doubted only half a century ago, whether our political system could be maintained at all, and whether, if maintained, it could guaranty the peace and happiness of society, it stands now confessed by the world the form of government not only most adapted to empire, but also most congenial to the constitution of human nature.

When we consider that the nation has been conducted to this haven, not only through stormy seas, but altogether also without a course and without a star; and when we consider, moreover, the sum of happiness that has already been enjoyed by the American people, and still more the influence which the great achievement is exerting on the advancement and melioration of the condition of mankind, we see at once that it might have satisfied the highest ambition to have been, no matter how humbly, concerned in so great a transaction.

Certainly, sir, no one will assert that HENRY CLAY in that transaction performed an obscure or even a common part. On the contrary, from the day on which he entered the public service until that on which he passed the gates of death, he was never a follower, but always a leader; and he marshaled either the party which sustained or that which resisted every great measure, equally in the Senate and in the popular canvass. And he led where duty seemed to him to indicate, reckless whether he encountered one President or twenty Presidents, whether he was opposed by factions or even by the whole people. Hence it has happened, that although that people are not yet agreed among themselves on the wisdom of all or perhaps of even any of his great measures, yet they are nevertheless unanimous in acknowledging that he was at once the greatest, the most faithful, and the most reliable of their statesmen. Here the effort at discriminating praise of HENRY CLAY in regard to his public policy must stop, even on this sad occasion, which awakens the ardent liberality of his generous survivors.

But his personal qualities may be discussed without apprehension. What were the elements of the success of that extraordinary man? You, sir, knew him longer and better than I, and I would prefer to hear you speak of them. He was indeed eloquent—all the world knows that. He held the keys to the hearts of his countrymen, and he turned the wards within them with a skill attained by no other master.

But eloquence was nevertheless only an instrument, and one of many that he used. His conversation, his gestures, his very look, was magisterial, persuasive, seductive, irresistible. And his appliance of all these was courteous, patient, and indefatigable. Defeat only inspired him with new resolution. He divided opposition by his assiduity of address, while he rallied and strengthened his own bands of supporters by the confidence of success which, feeling himself, he easily inspired among his followers. His affections were high and pure, and generous, and the chiefest among them was that one which the great Italian poet designated as the charity of native land. In him that charity was an enduring and overpowering enthusiasm, and it influenced all his sentiments and conduct, rendering him more impartial between conflicting interests and sections than any other statesman who has lived since the Revolution. Thus with great versatility of talent, and the most catholic equality of favor, he identified every question, whether of domestic administration or foreign policy, with his own great name, and so became a perpetual Tribune of the people. He needed only to pronounce in favor of a measure or against it, here, and immediately popular enthusiasm, excited as by a magic wand, was felt, overcoming and dissolving all opposition in the Senate Chamber.

In this way he wrought a change in our political system, that I think was not foreseen by its founders. He converted this branch of the Legislature from a negative position, or one of equilibrium between the Executive and the House of Representatives, into the active ruling power of the Republic. Only time can disclose whether this great innovation shall be beneficent, or even permanent.

Certainly, sir, the great lights of the Senate have set. The obscurity is not less palpable to the country than to us, who are left to grope our uncertain way here, as in a labyrinth, oppressed with self-distrust. The time, too, presents new embarrassments. We are rising to another and more sublime stage of national progress—that of expanding wealth and rapid territorial aggrandizement. Our institutions throw a broad shadow across the St. Lawrence, and, stretching beyond the valley of Mexico, reach even to the plains of Central America, while the Sandwich Islands and the shores of China recognize its renovating influence. Wherever that influence is felt, a desire for protection under those institutions is awakened. Expansion seems to be regulated not by any difficulties of resistance, but by the moderation which results from our own internal constitution. No one knows how rapidly that restraint may give way. Who can tell how far or how fast it ought to yield? Commerce has brought the ancient continents near to us, and created necessities for new positions—perhaps connections or colonies there—and with the trade and friendship of the elder nations their conflicts and collisions are brought to our doors and to our hearts. Our sympathy kindles, our indifference extinguishes, the fires of freedom in foreign lands. Before we shall be fully conscious that a change is going on in Europe, we may find ourselves once more divided by that eternal line of separation that leaves on the one side those of our citizens who obey the impulses of sympathy, while on the other are found those who submit only to the counsels of prudence. Even prudence will soon be required to decide whether distant regions, East and West, shall come under our own protection, or be left to aggrandize a rapidly-spreading domain of hostile despotism.

Sir, who among us is equal to these mighty questions? I fear there is no one. Nevertheless, the example of HENRY CLAY remains for our instruction. His genius has passed to the realms of light, but his virtues still live here for our emulation. With them there will remain also the protection and favor of the Most High, if by the practice of justice and the maintenance of freedom we shall deserve them. Let, then, the bier pass on. We will follow with sorrow, but not without hope, the reverend form that it bears to its final resting-place; and then, when that grave opens at our feet to receive so estimable a treasure, we will invoke the God of our fathers to send us new guides, like him that is now withdrawn, and give us wisdom to obey their instructions.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. Mr. President, of the vast number who mourn the departure of the great man whose voice has so often been heard in this Hall, I have peculiar cause to regret that dispensation which has removed him from among us. He was the guardian and director of my collegiate days; four of his sons were my college mates and warm friends. My intercourse with the father was that of a youth and a friendly adviser. I shall never cease to feel grateful to him—to his now heart-stricken and bereaved widow and children, for their many kindnesses to me during four or five years of my life. I had the pleasure of renewing my acquaintance with him, first, as a delegate in Congress, whilst he was a member of this body from 1835 to 1839, and again in 1848, as a member of this branch of Congress; and during the whole of which period, some eight years, none but the most kindly feeling existed between us.

As an humble and unimportant Senator, it was my fortune to cooperate with him throughout the whole of the exciting session of 1849-'50—the labor and excitement of which is said to have precipitated his decease. That cooperation did not end with the accordant vote on this floor, but, in consequence of the unyielding opposition to the series of measures known as the "compromise," extended to many private meetings held by its friends, at all of which Mr. CLAY was present. And whether in public or private life, he everywhere continued to inspire me with the most exalted estimate of his patriotism and statesmanship. Never shall I forget the many ardent appeals he made to Senators, in and out of the Senate, in favor of the settlement of our then unhappy sectional differences.

Immediately after the close of that memorable session of Congress, during which the nation beheld his great and almost superhuman efforts upon this floor to sustain the wise counsels of the "Father of his Country," I accompanied him home to Ashland, at his invitation, to revisit the place where my happiest days had been spent, with the friends who there continued to reside. During that, to me, most agreeable and instructive journey, in many conversations he evinced the utmost solicitude for the welfare and honor of the Republic, all tending to show that he believed the happiness of the people and the cause of liberty throughout the world depended upon the continuance of our glorious Union, and the avoidance of those sectional dissensions which could but alienate the affections of one portion of the people from another. With the sincerity and fervor of a true patriot, he warned his companions in that journey to withhold all aid from men who labored, and from every cause which tended, to sow the seeds of disunion in the land; and to oppose such, he declared himself willing to forego all the ties and associations of mere party.

At a subsequent period, sir, this friend of my youth, at my earnest and repeated entreaties, consented to take a sea voyage from New York to Havana. He remained at the latter place a fortnight, and then returned by New Orleans to Ashland. That excursion by sea, he assured me, contributed much to relieve him from the sufferings occasioned by the disease which has just terminated his eventful and glorious life. Would to Heaven that he could have been persuaded to abandon his duties as a Senator, and to have remained during the past winter and spring upon that Island of Cuba! The country would not now, perhaps, have been called to mourn his loss.

In some matters of policy connected with the administration of our General Government, I have disagreed with him, yet the purity and sincerity of his motives I never doubted; and as a true lover of his country, as an honorable and honest man, I trust his example will be revered and followed by the men of this, and of succeeding generations.

Mr. BROOKE. Mr. President, as an ardent, personal admirer and political friend of the distinguished dead, I claim the privilege of adding my humble tribute of respect to his memory, and of joining in the general expression of sorrow that has gone forth from this Chamber. Death, at all times, is an instructive monitor as well as a mournful messenger; but when his fatal shaft hath stricken down the great in intellect and renown, how doubly impressive the lesson that it brings home to the heart that the grave is the common lot of all—the great leveler of all earthly distinctions! But at the same time we are taught that in one sense the good and great can never die; for the memory of their virtues and their bright example will live through all coming time in an immortality that blooms beyond the grave. The consolation of this thought may calm our sorrow; and, in the language of one of our own poets, it may be asked:

"Why weep ye, then, for him, who having run
The bound of man's appointed years, at last,
Life's blessings all enjoyed, life's labors done,
Serenely to his final rest has passed;
While the soft memory of his virtues yet
Lingers, like twilight hues when the bright sun has set?"

It will be doing no injustice, sir, to the living or the dead to say that no better specimen of the true American character can be found in our history than that of Mr. CLAY. With no adventitious advantages of birth or fortune, he won his way by the efforts of his own genius to the highest distinction and honor. Ardently attached to the principles of civil and religious liberty, patriotism was with him both a passion and a sentiment—a passion that gave energy to his ambition, and a sentiment that pervaded all his thoughts and actions, concentrating them upon his country as the idol of his heart. The bold and manly frankness in the expression of his opinions which always characterized him has often been the subject of remark; and in all his victories it may be truly said he never "stooped to conquer." In his long and brilliant political career, personal considerations never for a single instant caused him to swerve from the strict line of duty, and none have ever doubted his deep sincerity in that memorable expression to Mr. Preston, "Sir, I had rather be right than be President."

This is not the time nor occasion, sir, to enter into a detail of the public services of Mr. CLAY, interwoven as they are with the history of the country for half a century; but I cannot refrain from adverting to the last crowning act of his glorious life—his great effort in the Thirty-first Congress for the preservation of the peace and integrity of this great Republic, as it was this effort that shattered his bodily strength and hastened the consummation of death. The Union of the States, as being essential to our prosperity and happiness, was the paramount proposition in his political creed, and the slightest symptom of danger to its perpetuity filled him with alarm, and called forth all the energies of his body and mind. In his earlier life he had met this danger and overcome it. In the conflict of contending factions it again appeared; and coming forth from the repose of private life, to which age and infirmity had carried him, with unabated strength of intellect, he again entered upon the arena of political strife, and again success crowned his efforts, and peace and harmony were restored to a distracted people. But unequal to the mighty struggle, his bodily strength sank beneath it, and he retired from the field of his glory to yield up his life as a holy sacrifice to his beloved country. It has well been said that peace has its victories as well as war; and how bright upon the page of history will be the record of this great victory of intellect, of reason, and of moral suasion, over the spirit of discord and sectional animosities!

We this day, Mr. President, commit his memory to the regard and affection of his admiring countrymen. It is a consolation to them and to us to know that he died in full possession of his glorious intellect, and, what is better, in the enjoyment of that "peace which the world can neither give" nor take away. He sank to rest as the full-orbed king of day, unshorn of a single beam, or rather like the planet of mornings, his brightness was but eclipsed by the opening to him of a more full and perfect day—

"No waning of fire, no paling of ray,
But rising, still rising, as passing away.
Farewell, gallant eagle, thou'rt buried in light—
God speed thee to heaven, lost star of our night."

The resolutions were unanimously adopted, and, in pursuance thereof, the President pro tem. made the following appointments:

On motion by Mr. UNDERWOOD, it was Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

The Senate adjourned accordingly till to-morrow at twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 30, 1852.

DEATH OF MR. CLAY.

The House met at the usual hour, but was not called to order till ten minutes past two o'clock, in consequence of the death of Mr. CLAY, the formal announcement of which was to be received from the Senate.

The Rev. C. M. BUTLER then addressed the Throne of Grace as follows:

Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, we beseech thee to look upon us in love, to forgive us our sins, and to bestow upon us thy blessing. Take us as a nation into thy holy keeping. Bless the President and Congress of these United States, and all who are in authority; enable them faithfully and fraternally to accomplish thy will, that they may enjoy thy perpetual benediction.

Heavenly Father, thou hast in thy wise Providence seen fit to take out of this world the soul of him at whose departure a nation weeps. We bow in resignation to thy blessed will, and acknowledge that thou doest all things well. We thank thee for the signal public services which the departed statesman, whose death we mourn to-day, was permitted to render to his country. We thank thee for the circumstances of mercy and consolation connected with his sickness and his death. We thank thee for the grace that sustained him in submissive patience amidst his protracted suffering, and for the testimony which thou didst enable him to give to the power and excellency of thy gospel. We bless thee that we are permitted to think of him, whose long suffering we mourn, as now resting in the peace and paradise of God.

We commend to thy fatherly care the bereaved wife, the children and the relatives of the departed. Remember them, O Lord, in mercy. Sanctify thy fatherly correction to them. Endow their souls with patience under their affliction, and with resignation to thy blessed will. Comfort them with a sense of thy goodness, and enable them to prepare to follow him who has gone before them to that better world, where God wipes away all tears from those whom death has swallowed up in victory.

We beseech thee to bless this dispensation of thy Providence to the members of this Congress here and now assembled, and to all who are engaged in the public service. Teach them that the glory of man is as the flower of the grass—that the fashion of this world passeth away. Teach them the folly of ambition, the sin of strife, and the nothingness of renown. Make them so to lay to heart this lesson of mortality as to live above the world, to seek thy favor, to study thy law, and in all their actions to aim at thy glory, at the good of their own souls, and of the souls of their fellow-men.

And when we are called to go the way of all the earth, may we depart in the confidence of a certain faith, in the comfort of a reasonable, religious, and holy hope, in favor with thee, our God, and perfect charity with the world. All of which we ask in the name and for the sake of Jesus Christ, our Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday having been read,

A message was received from the Senate by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., its Secretary, announcing the death of HENRY CLAY, late Senator from Kentucky, and the adoption of the following proceedings by that body, viz:

Resolved, That a committee of six be appointed by the President of the Senate to take order for superintending the funeral of HENRY CLAY, late a member of this body, which will take place to-morrow at twelve o'clock, meridian, and that the Senate will attend the same.

Resolved, That the members of the Senate, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, will go into mourning for one month by the usual mode of wearing crape on the left arm.

Resolved, as a further mark of respect entertained by the Senate for the memory of HENRY CLAY and his long and distinguished services to his country, that his remains, in pursuance of the known wishes of his family, be removed to the place of sepulture, selected by himself, at Lexington, in Kentucky, in charge of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and attended by a committee of six Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, who shall have full power to carry this resolution into effect.

Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HUNTER, Mr. DAWSON, Mr. JONES of Iowa, Mr. COOPER, Mr. BRIGHT, and Mr. SMITH, were appointed the Committee of Arrangements.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE then rose and said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I rise to perform the melancholy duty of announcing to this body the death of HENRY CLAY, late a Senator in Congress from the Commonwealth of Kentucky.

Mr. CLAY expired at his lodgings in this city yesterday morning at seventeen minutes past eleven o'clock, in the seventy-sixth year of his age. His noble intellect was unclouded to the last. After protracted sufferings, he passed away without pain; and so gently did the spirit leave his frame, that the moment of departure was not observed by the friends who watched at his bedside. His last hours were cheered by the presence of an affectionate son, and he died surrounded by friends who, during his long illness, had done all that affection could suggest to soothe his sufferings.

Although this sad event has been expected for many weeks, the shock it produced, and the innumerable tributes of respect to his memory exhibited on every side, and in every form, prove the depth of the public sorrow and the greatness of the public loss.

Imperishably associated as his name has been for fifty years with every great event affecting the fortunes of our country, it is difficult to realize that he is indeed gone forever. It is difficult to feel that we shall see no more his noble form within these walls—that we shall hear no more his patriot tones, now rousing his countrymen to vindicate their rights against a foreign foe, now imploring them to preserve concord among themselves. We shall see him no more. The memory and the fruits of his services alone remain to us. Amidst the general gloom, the Capitol itself looks desolate, as if the genius of the place had departed. Already the intelligence has reached almost every quarter of the Republic, and a great people mourn with us, to-day, the death of their most illustrious citizen. Sympathizing, as we do, deeply, with his family and friends, yet private affliction is absorbed in the general sorrow. The spectacle of a whole community lamenting the loss of a great man, is far more touching than any manifestation of private grief. In speaking of a loss which is national, I will not attempt to describe the universal burst of grief with which Kentucky will receive these tidings. The attempt would be vain to depict the gloom that will cover her people, when they know that the pillar of fire is removed, which has guided their footsteps for the life of a generation.

It is known to the country, that from the memorable session of 1849-'50, Mr. CLAY's health gradually declined. Although several years of his Senatorial term remained, he did not propose to continue in the public service longer than the present session. He came to Washington chiefly to defend, if it should become necessary, the measures of adjustment, to the adoption of which he so largely contributed; but the condition of his health did not allow him, at any time, to participate in the discussions of the Senate. During the winter, he was confined almost wholly to his room, with slight changes in his condition, but gradually losing the remnant of his strength. Through the long and dreary winter, he conversed much and cheerfully with his friends, and expressed a deep interest in public affairs. Although he did not expect a restoration to health, he cherished the hope that the mild season of spring would bring to him strength enough to return to Ashland, and die in the bosom of his family. But alas! spring, that brings life to all nature, brought no life nor hope to him. After the month of March, his vital powers rapidly wasted, and for weeks he lay patiently awaiting the stroke of death. But the approach of the destroyer had no terrors for him. No clouds overhung his future. He met the end with composure, and his pathway to the grave was brightened by the immortal hopes which spring from the Christian faith.

Not long before his death, having just returned from Kentucky, I bore to him a token of affection from his excellent wife. Never can I forget his appearance, his manner, or his words. After speaking of his family, his friends, and his country, he changed the conversation to his own future, and looking on me with his fine eye undimmed, and his voice full of its original compass and melody, he said, "I am not afraid to die, sir. I have hope, faith, and some confidence. I do not think any man can be entirely certain in regard to his future state, but I have an abiding trust in the merits and mediation of our Saviour." It will assuage the grief of his family to know that he looked hopefully beyond the tomb, and a Christian people will rejoice to hear that such a man in his last hours, reposed with simplicity and confidence on the promises of the Gospel.

It is the custom on occasions like this, to speak of the parentage and childhood of the deceased, and to follow him; step by step, through life. I will not attempt to relate even all the great events of Mr. CLAY's life, because they are familiar to the whole country, and it would be needless to enumerate a long list of public services which form a part of American history.

Beginning life as a friendless boy, with few advantages save those conferred by nature, while yet a minor he left Virginia, the State of his birth, and commenced the practice of law at Lexington, in Kentucky. At a bar remarkable for its numbers and talent, Mr. CLAY soon rose to the first rank. At a very early age he was elected from the county of Fayette to the General Assembly of Kentucky, and was the Speaker of that body. Coming into the Senate of the United States, for the first time, in 1806, he entered upon a parliamentary career, the most brilliant and successful in our annals. From that time, he remained habitually in the public eye. As a Senator, as a member of this House, and its Speaker, as a representative of his country abroad, and as a high officer in the Executive department of the Government, he was intimately connected for fifty years with every great measure of American policy. Of the mere party measures of this period, I do not propose to speak. Many of them have passed away, and are remembered only as the occasion for the great intellectual efforts which marked their discussion. Concerning others, opinions are still divided. They will go into history, with the reasons on either side rendered by the greatest intellects of the time.

As a leader in a deliberative body, Mr. CLAY had no equal in America. In him, intellect, person, eloquence, and courage, united to form a character fit to command. He fired with his own enthusiasm, and controlled by his amazing will, individuals and masses. No reverse could crush his spirit, nor defeat reduce him to despair. Equally erect and dauntless in prosperity and adversity; when successful, he moved to the accomplishment of his purposes with severe resolution; when defeated, he rallied his broken bands around him, and from his eagle eye shot along their ranks the contagion of his own courage. Destined for a leader, he everywhere asserted his destiny. In his long and eventful life he came in contact with men of all ranks and professions, but he never felt that he was in the presence of a man superior to himself. In the assemblies of the people, at the bar, in the Senate—everywhere within the circle of his personal presence he assumed and maintained a position of preeminence.

But the supremacy of Mr. CLAY as a party leader was not his only nor his highest title to renown. That title is to be found in the purely patriotic spirit which, on great occasions, always signalized his conduct. We have had no statesman who in periods of real and imminent public peril has exhibited a more genuine and enlarged patriotism than HENRY CLAY. Whenever a question presented itself actually threatening the existence of the Union, Mr. CLAY, rising above the passions of the hour, always exerted his powers to solve it peacefully and honorably. Although more liable than most men, from his impetuous and ardent nature, to feel strongly the passions common to us all, it was his rare faculty to be able to subdue them in a great crisis, and to hold towards all sections of the Confederacy the language of concord and brotherhood.

Sir, it will be a proud pleasure to every true American heart to remember the great occasions when Mr. CLAY has displayed a sublime patriotism—when the ill-temper engendered by the times, and the miserable jealousies of the day, seemed to have been driven from his bosom, by the expulsive power of nobler feelings—when every throb of his heart was given to his country, every effort of his intellect dedicated to her service. Who does not remember the three periods when the American system of Government was exposed to its severest trials; and who does not know that when history shall relate the struggles which preceded and the dangers which were averted by the Missouri compromise—the tariff compromise of 1832, and the adjustment of 1850, the same pages will record the genius, the eloquence, and the patriotism of HENRY CLAY?

Nor was it in Mr. CLAY's nature to lag behind until measures of adjustment were matured, and then come forward to swell a majority. On the contrary, like a bold and real statesman, he was ever among the first to meet the peril, and hazard his fame upon the remedy. It is fresh in the memory of us all that, when lately the fury of sectional discord threatened to sever the Confederacy, Mr. CLAY, though withdrawn from public life, and oppressed by the burden of years, came back to the Senate, the theater of his glory, and devoted the remnant of his strength to the sacred duty of preserving the union of the States.

With characteristic courage he took the lead in proposing a scheme of settlement. But while he was willing to assume the responsibility of proposing a plan, he did not, with petty ambition, insist upon its adoption to the exclusion of other modes; but taking his own as a starting point for discussion and practical action, he nobly labored with his compatriots to change and improve it in such form as to make it an acceptable adjustment. Throughout the long and arduous struggle, the love of country expelled from his bosom the spirit of selfishness, and Mr. CLAY proved for the third time, that though he was ambitious, and loved glory, he had no ambition to mount to fame on the confusions of his country. And this conviction is lodged in the hearts of the people; the party measures and the party passions of former times have not, for several years, interposed between Mr. CLAY and the masses of his countrymen. After 1850 he seemed to feel that his mission was accomplished, and during the same period the regards and affections of the American people have been attracted to him in a remarkable degree. For many months the warmest feelings—the deepest anxieties of all parties centered upon the dying statesman; the glory of his great actions shed a mellow lustre on his declining years, and to fill the measure of his fame, his countrymen, weaving for him the laurel wreath, with common hands, did bind it about his venerable brows, and send him crowned, to history.

The life of Mr. CLAY, sir, is a striking example of the abiding fame which surely awaits the direct and candid statesman. The entire absence of equivocation or disguise in all his acts was his master-key to the popular heart; for while the people will forgive the errors of a bold and open nature, he sins past forgiveness who deliberately deceives them. Hence Mr. CLAY, though often defeated in his measures of policy, always secured the respect of his opponents without losing the confidence of his friends. He never paltered in a double sense. The country was never in doubt as to his opinions or his purposes. In all the contests of his time, his position on great public questions was as clear as the sun in a cloudless sky. Sir, standing by the grave of this great man, and considering these things, how contemptible does appear the mere legerdemain of politics! what a reproach is his life on that false policy which would trifle with a great and upright people! If I were to write his epitaph, I would inscribe as the highest eulogy, on the stone which shall mark his resting place, "Here lies a man who was in the public service for fifty years, and never attempted to deceive his countrymen."

While the youth of America should imitate his noble qualities, they may take courage from his career and note the high proof it affords that under our equal institutions the avenues to honor are open to all. Mr. CLAY rose by the force of his own genius, unaided by power, patronage, or wealth. At an age when our young men are usually advanced to the higher schools of learning, provided only with the rudiments of an English education, he turned his steps to the West, and amidst the rude collisions of a border life, matured a character whose highest exhibitions were destined to mark eras in his country's history. Beginning on the frontiers of American civilization, the orphan boy, supported only by the consciousness of his own powers, and by the confidence of the people, surmounted all the barriers of adverse fortune, and won a glorious name in the annals of his country. Let the generous youth, fired with honorable ambition, remember that the American system of Government offers on every hand bounties to merit. If, like CLAY, orphanage, obscurity, poverty, shall oppress him; yet if, like CLAY, he feels the Promethean spark within, let him remember that his country, like a generous mother, extends her arms to welcome and to cherish every one of her children whose genius and worth may promote her prosperity or increase her renown.

Mr. Speaker, the signs of woe around us and the general voice announce that another great man has fallen. Our consolation is that he was not taken in the vigor of his manhood, but sunk into the grave at the close of a long and illustrious career. The great statesmen who have filled the largest space in the public eye, one by one are passing away. Of the three great leaders of the Senate, one alone remains, and he must follow soon. We shall witness no more their intellectual struggles in the American forum; but the monuments of their genius will be cherished as the common property of the people, and their names will continue to confer dignity and renown upon their country.

Not less illustrious than the greatest of these will be the name of CLAY—a name pronounced with pride by Americans in every quarter of the globe; a name to be remembered while history shall record the struggles of modern Greece for freedom, or the spirit of liberty burn in the South American bosom; a living and immortal name—a name that would descend to posterity without the aid of letters, borne by tradition from generation to generation. Every memorial of such a man will possess a meaning and a value to his countrymen. His tomb will be a hallowed spot. Great memories will cluster there, and his countrymen, as they visit it, may well exclaim—

"Such graves as his are pilgrim shrines,
Shrines to no creed or code confined;
The Delphian rales, the Palestines,
The Meccas of the mind."

Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives of the United States has received, with the deepest sensibility, intelligence of the death of HENRY CLAY.

Resolved, That the officers and members of the House of Representatives will wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days, as a testimony of the profound respect this House entertains for the memory of the deceased.

Resolved, That the officers and members of the House of Representatives, in a body, will attend the funeral of HENRY CLAY, on the day appointed for that purpose by the Senate of the United States.

Resolved, That the proceedings of this House, in relation to the death of HENRY CLAY, be communicated to the family of the deceased by the Clerk.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, this House do now adjourn.

Mr. EWING rose and said: A noble heart has ceased to beat forever. A long life of brilliant and self-devoted public service is finished at last. And we now stand at its conclusion looking back through the changeful history of that life to its beginning, contemporaneous with the very birth of the Republic; and its varied events mingle in our hearts and our memories—with the triumph and calamities, the weakness and the power, the adversity and prosperity of a country we love so much. As we contemplate this sad event, in this place, the shadows of the past gather over us; the memories of events long gone crowd upon us, and the shades of departed patriots seem to hover about us, and wait to receive into their midst the spirit of one who was worthy to be a co-laborer with them in a common cause, and to share in the rewards of their virtues. Henceforth he must be to us as one of them.

They say he was ambitious. If so it was a grievous fault, and grievously has he answered it. He has found in it naught but disappointment. It has but served to aggravate the mortification of his defeats, and furnish an additional luster to the triumph of his foes. Those who come after us may, ay, they will, inquire why his statue stands not among the statues of those whom men thought ablest and worthiest to govern.

But his ambition was a high and holy feeling—unselfish, magnanimous. Its aspirations were for his country's good, and its triumph was his country's prosperity. Whether in honor or reproach, in triumph or defeat, that heart of his never throbbed with one pulsation save for her honor and her welfare. Turn to him in that last best deed, and crowning glory of a life so full of public service and of honor, when his career of personal ambition was finished forever. Rejected again and again by his countrymen; just abandoned by a party which would scarce have had an existence without his genius, his courage, and his labors, that great heart, ever firm and defiant to the assaults of his enemies, but defenseless against the ingratitude of friends, doubtless wrung with the bitterest mortification of his life—then it was, and under such circumstances as these, the gathering storm rose upon his country. All eyes turned to him; all voices called for those services which, in the hour of prosperity and security, they had so carelessly rejected. With no misanthropic chagrin; with no morose, selfish resentment, he forgot all but his country and that country endangered. He returns to the scene of his labors and his fame which he had thought to have left forever. A scene—that American Senate Chamber—clothed in no gorgeous drapery, shrouded in no superstitious awe or ancient reverence for hereditary power, but to a reflecting American mind more full of interest, of dignity, and of grandeur than any spot on this broad earth, not made holy by religion's consecrating seal. See him as he enters there, tremblingly, but hopefully, upon the last, most momentous, perhaps most doubtful conflict of his life. Sir, many a gay tournament has been more dazzling to the eye of fancy, more gorgeous and imposing in the display of jewelry and cloth of gold, in the sound of heralds' trumpets, in the grand array of princely beauty and of royal pride. Many a battle-field has trembled beneath a more ostentatious parade of human power, and its conquerors have been crowned with laurels, honored with triumphs, and apotheosized amid the demigods of history; but to the thoughtful, hopeful, philanthropic student of the annals of his race, never was there a conflict in which such dangers were threatened, such hopes imperiled, or the hero of which deserved a warmer gratitude, a nobler triumph, or a prouder monument.

Sir, from that long, anxious, and exhausting conflict he never rose again. In that last battle for his country's honor and his country's safety he received the mortal wound which laid him low; and we now mourn the death of a martyred patriot.

But never, in all the grand drama which the story of his life arrays, never has he presented a sublimer or a more touching spectacle than in those last days of his decline and death. Broken with the storms of State, wounded and scathed in many a fiery conflict, that aged, worn, and decayed body, in such mournful contrast with the never-dying strength of his giant spirit, he seemed a proud and sacred, though a crumbling monument of past glory. Standing amongst us, like some ancient colossal ruin amidst the degenerate and more diminutive structures of modern times, its vast proportions magnified by the contrast, he reminded us of those days when there were giants in the land, and we remembered that even then there was none whose prowess could withstand his arm. To watch him in that slow decline, yielding with dignity, and as it were inch by inch to that last enemy, as a hero yields to a conquering foe, the glorious light of his intellect blazing still in all its wonted brilliancy, and setting at defiance the clouds that vainly attempted to obscure it, he was more full of interest than in the day of his glory and his power. There are some men whose brightest intellectual emanations rise so little superior to the instincts of the animal, that we are led fearfully to doubt that cherished truth of the soul's immortality, which, even in despair, men press to their doubting hearts. But it is in the death of such a man as he, that we are reassured by the contemplation of a kindred though superior spirit, of a soul which, immortal, like his fame, knows no old age, no decay, no death.

The wondrous light of his unmatched intellect may have dazzled a world; the eloquence of that inspired tongue may have enchanted millions, but there are few who have sounded the depths of that noble heart. To see him in sickness and in health, in joy and in sadness, in the silent watches of the night and in the busy daytime—this it was to know and love him. To see the impetuous torrent of that resistless will—the hurricane of those passions hushed in peace, breathe calm and gently as a summer zephyr; to feel the gentle pressure of that hand in the grasp of friendship which in the rage of fiery conflict would hurl scorn and defiance at his foe; to see that eagle eye which oft would burn with patriotic ardor or flash with the lightning of his anger, beam with the kindest expressions of tenderness and affection—then it was, and then alone, we could learn to know and feel that that heart was warmed by the same sacred fire from above which enkindled the light of his resplendent intellect. In the death of such a man even patriotism itself might pause, and for a moment stand aloof while friendship shed a tear of sorrow upon his bier.

"His life was gentle; and the elements
So mix'd in him, that Nature might stand up
And say to all the world, This was a man!"

But who can estimate his country's loss? What tongue portray the desolation which in this hour throughout this broad land hangs like a gloomy pall over his grief-stricken countrymen? How poorly can words like mine translate the eloquence of a whole people's grief for a patriot's death! For a nation's loss let a nation mourn. For that stupendous calamity to our country and mankind, be the heavens hung with black; let the wailing elements chant his dirge, and the universal heart of man throb with one common pang of grief and anguish.

Mr. CASKIE said: Mr. Speaker, I must try to lay a single laurel leaf in that open coffin which is already garlanded by the eloquent tributes to the illustrious departed, which have been heard in this now solemn Hall,—for I come, sir, from the district of his birth. I represent on this floor that old Hanover so proud of her Henrys—her Patrick

Henry and her HENRY CLAY. I speak for a people among whom he has always had as earnest and devoted friends as were ever the grace and glory of a patriot and statesman.

I shall attempt no sketch of his life. That you have had from other and abler hands than mine. Till yesterday that life was, of his own free gift, the property of his country; to-day it belongs to her history. It is known to all, and will not be forgotten. Constant, stern opponent of his political school as has been my State, I say for her, that nowhere in this broad land are his great qualities more admired, or his death more mourned, than in Virginia. Well may this be so; for she is his mother, and he was her son.

Mr. Speaker, when I remember the party strifes in which he was so much mingled, and through which we all more or less have passed, and then survey this scene, and think how far, as the lightning has borne the news that he is gone, half-masted flags are drooping and church-bells are tolling, and men are sorrowing—I can but feel that it is good for man to die. For when death enters, oh! how the unkindnesses and jealousies, and rivalries of life do vanish, and how, like incense from an altar, do peace and friendship and all the sweet charities of our nature rise around the corpse which was once a man!

And of a truth, Mr. Speaker, never was more of veritable, noble manhood cased in mortal mould than was found in him to whose memory this brief and humble but true and heart-felt tribute is paid. But his eloquent voice is hushed, his high heart is stilled. "Like a shock of corn fully ripe, he has been gathered to his fathers." With more than three-score years and ten upon him, and honors clustered thick about him, in the full possession of unclouded intellect, and all the consolations of christianity, he has met the fate which is evitable by none. Lamented by all his countrymen, his name is bright on Fame's immortal roll. He has finished his course, and he has his crown. What more fruit can life bear? What can it give that HENRY CLAY has not gained?

Then, Mr. Speaker, around his tomb should be heard not only the dirge that wails his loss, but the jubilant anthem which sounds that on the world's great battle-field another victory has been won, another incontestable greatness achieved.

Mr. CHANDLER said: Mr. Speaker, it would seem as if the solemn invocation of the honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. EWING] was receiving an early answer, and that the heavens are hung in black, and the wailing elements are singing the funeral dirge of HENRY CLAY. Amid this elemental gloom and the distress which pervades the nation at the death of HENRY CLAY, private grief should not obtrude itself upon notice, nor personal anguish seek for utterance. Silence is the best exponent of individual sorrow, and the heart that knoweth its own bitterness shrinks from an exposition of its affliction.

Could I have consulted my own feelings on the event which occupies the attention of the House at the present moment, I should even have forborne attendance here, and in the solitude and silence of my chamber, have mused upon the terrible lesson which has been administered to the people and the nation. But I represent a constituency who justly pride themselves upon the unwavering attachment they have ever felt and manifested to HENRY CLAY—a constant, pervading, hereditary love; the son has taken up the father's affection, and amid all the professions of political attachments to others, whom the accidents of party have made prominent, and the success of party has made powerful, true to his own instincts, and true to the sanctified legacy of his father, he has placed the name of HENRY CLAY forward and preëminent as the exponent of what is greatest in statesmanship, and purest in patriotism. And even, sir, when party fealty caused other attachments to be avowed for party uses, the preference was limited to the occupancy of office, and superiority admitted for CLAY, in all that is reckoned above party estimation.

Nor ought I to forbear to add, that as the senior member of the delegation which represents my Commonwealth, I am requested to utter the sentiments of the people of Pennsylvania at large, who yield to no portion of this great Union, in their appreciation of the talents, their reverence for the lofty patriotism, their admiration of the statesmanship, and hereafter their love of the memory of HENRY CLAY.

I cannot, therefore, be silent on this occasion, without injustice to the affections of my constituency, even though I painfully feel how inadequate to the reverence and love my people have towards that statesman, must be all that I have to utter on this mournful occasion.

I know not, Mr. Chairman, where now the nation is to find the men she needs in peril. Either other calls than those of politics are holding in abeyance the talents which the nation may need, or else a generation is to pass undistinguished by the greatness of our statesmen. Of the noble minds that have swayed the Senate, one yet survives in the maturity of powerful intellect, carefully disciplined and nobly exercised. May He who has thus far blessed our nation, spare to her and the world, that of which the world must always envy our country the possession. But my business is with the dead.

The biography of HENRY CLAY, from his childhood upward, is too familiar to every American, for me to trespass on the time of this House, by a reference directly thereto; and the honorable gentlemen who have preceded me, have with affectionate hand and appropriate delicacy, swept away the dust which nearly four score years have scattered over a part of the record, and have made our pride greater in his life, and our grief more poignant at his death, by showing some of those passages which attract respect to our republican institutions, of which Mr. CLAY's whole life was the able support, and most successful illustration.

It would, then, be a work of supererogation for me to renew that effort, though inquiry into the life and conduct of HENRY CLAY would present new themes for private eulogy; new grounds for public gratitude.

How rare is it, Mr. Speaker, that the great man, living, can, with confidence, rely on extensive personal friendship, or, dying, think to awaken a sentiment of regret beyond that which includes the public loss or the disappointment of individual hopes. Yet, sir, the message which yesterday went forth from this city, that HENRY CLAY was dead, brought sorrow, personal, private, special sorrow to the hearts of thousands. Each of whom felt that from his own love for, his long attachment to, his disinterested hopes in, HENRY CLAY, he had a particular sorrow to cherish and express, which weighed upon his heart, separate from the sense of national loss.

No man, Mr. Speaker, in our nation, had the art so to identify himself with public measures of the most momentous character, and to maintain, at the same time, almost universal affection, like that great statesman. His business, from his boyhood, was with national concerns, and he dealt with them as with familiar things. And yet his sympathies were with individual interests, enterprises, affections, joys, and sorrows; and while every patriot bowed in humble deference to his lofty attainments and heartfelt gratitude for his national services, almost every man in this vast Republic knew that the great statesman was, in feeling and experience, identified with his own position. Hence, the universal love of the people; hence, their enthusiasm in all times, for his fame. Hence, sir, their present grief.

Many other public men of our country have distinguished themselves, and brought honor to the nation, by superiority in some peculiar branch of public service, but it seems to have been the gift of Mr. CLAY to have acquired peculiar eminence in every path of duty he was called to tread. In the earnestness of debate, which great public interests and distinguished opposing talents excited in this House, he had no superior in energy, force, or effect. Yet as the presiding officer, by blandness of language, and firmness of purpose, he soothed and made orderly; and thus, by official dignity, he commanded the respect which energy had secured to him on the floor.

Wherever official or social duties demanded an exercise of his power, there was a preëminence which seemed prescriptively his own. In the lofty debate of the Senate and the stirring harangues to popular assemblages, he was the orator of the nation, and of the people; and the sincerity of purpose, and the unity of design evinced in all he said or did, fixed in the public mind a confidence strong and expansive as the affections he had won.

Year after year, sir, has HENRY CLAY been achieving the work of the mission with which he was intrusted; and it was only when the warmest wishes of his warmest friends were disappointed, that he entered on the fruition of a patriot's highest hopes, and stood in the full enjoyment of that admiration and confidence which nothing but the antagonism of party relations could have divided.

How rich that enjoyment must have been, it is only for us to imagine. How eminently deserved it was, we and the world can attest.

The love and the devotions of his political friends were cheering and grateful to his heart, and were acknowledged in all his life—were recognized even to his death.

The contest in the Senate Chamber or the forum was rewarded with success achieved, and the great victor could enjoy the ovation which partial friendship or the gratitude of the benefited prepared. But the triumph of his life was no party achievement. It was not in the applause which admiring friends and defeated antagonists offered to his measureless success, that he found the reward of his labors and comprehended the extent of his mission.

It was only when friends and antagonists pained in their contests, appalled at the public difficulties and national dangers which had been accumulating, unseen and unregarded; it was only when the nation itself felt the danger, and acknowledged the inefficacy of party action as a remedy, that HENRY CLAY calculated the full extent of his power, and enjoyed the reward of their saving exercise. Then, sir, you saw, and I saw, party designations dropped, and party allegiance disavowed, and anxious patriots, of all localities and name, turn towards the country's benefactor as the man for the terrible exigencies of the hour; and the sick chamber of HENRY CLAY became the Delphos, whence were given out the oracles that presented the means and the measures of our Union's safety. There, sir, and not in the high places of the country, were the labors and sacrifices of half a century to be rewarded and closed. With his right yet in that Senate which he had entered the youngest, and lingered still the eldest, member, he felt that his work was done, and the object of his life accomplished. Every cloud that had dimmed the noonday luster had been dissipated; and the retiring orb, which sunk from the sight of the nation in fullness and in beauty, will yet pour up the horizon a posthumous glory that shall tell of the splendor and greatness of the luminary that has passed away.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, although I have been all my life a party opponent of Mr. CLAY, yet from my boyhood I have been upon terms of personal friendship with him. More than twenty years ago, I was introduced to him by my father, who was his personal friend. From that time to this, there has existed between us as great personal intimacy as the disparity in our years, and our political difference would justify. After I became a member of this House, and upon his return to the Senate, subsequent to his resignation in 1842, the warm regard upon his part for the daughter of a devoted friend of forty years' standing, made him a constant visitor at my house, and frequently a guest at my table. These circumstances make it proper, that upon this occasion, I should pay this last tribute to his memory. I not only knew him well as a statesman, but I knew him better in the most unreserved social intercourse. The most happy circumstance, as I esteem it, of my political life has been, that I have thus known each of our great Congressional triumvirate.

I, sir, never knew a man of higher qualities than Mr. CLAY. His very faults originated in high qualities. With greater self-possession, with greater self-reliance than any man I ever knew, he possessed moral and physical courage to as high a degree as any man who ever lived. Confident in his own judgment, never doubting as to his own course, fearing no obstacle that might lie in his way, it was almost impossible that he should not have been imperious in his character. Never doubting himself as to what he thought duty and patriotism required at his hands, it was natural that he should sometimes have been impatient with those more doubting and timid than himself. His were qualities to have made a great general, as they were qualities that did make him a great statesman, and these qualities were so obvious that during the darkest period of our late war with Great Britain, Mr. Madison had determined, at one time, to make him General-in-Chief of the American army.

Sir, it is but a short time since the American Congress buried the first one that went to the grave of that great triumvirate. We are now called upon to bury another. The third, thank God! still lives, and long may he live to enlighten his countrymen by his wisdom, and set them the example of exalted patriotism. Sir, in the lives and characters of these great men, there is much resembling those of the great triumvirate of the British Parliament. It differs principally in this: Burke preceded Fox and Pitt to the tomb. Webster survives Clay and Calhoun. When Fox and Pitt died, there were no others to fill their place. Webster still lives, now that Calhoun and Clay are dead, the unrivaled statesman of his country. Like Fox and Pitt, Clay and Calhoun lived in troubled times. Like Fox and Pitt, they were each of them the leader of rival parties. Like Fox and Pitt they were idolized by their respective friends. Like Fox and Pitt, they died about the same time, and in the public service; and as has been said of Fox and Pitt, Clay and Calhoun died with "their harness upon them." Like Fox and Pitt—

"With more than mortal powers endowed,
How high they soared above the crowd;
There was no common party race,
Jostling by dark intrigue for place—
Like fabled gods their mighty war
Shook realms and nations in its jar.
Beneath each banner, proud to stand,
Looked up the noblest of the land.

"Here let their discord with them die.
Speak not for those a separate doom;
Whom fate made brothers in the tomb;
But search the land of living men,
Where wilt thou find their like again?"

Mr. VENABLE said: Mr. Speaker, I trust that I shall be pardoned for adding a few words upon this sad occasion. The life of the illustrious statesman which has just terminated is so interwoven with our history, and the lustre of his great name so profusely shed over its pages, that simple admiration of his high qualities might well be my excuse. But it is a sacred privilege to draw near; to contemplate the end of the great and the good. It is profitable as well as purifying to look upon and realize the office of death in removing all that can excite jealousy or produce distrust, and to gaze upon the virtues which like jewels have survived his powers of destruction. The light which radiates from the life of a great and patriotic statesman is often dimmed by the mists which party conflicts throw around it. But the blast which strikes him down purifies the atmosphere which surrounded him in life, and it shines forth in bright examples and well-earned renown. It is then that we witness the sincere acknowledgment of gratitude by a people who, having enjoyed the benefits arising from the services of an eminent statesman, embalm his name in their memory and hearts. We should cherish such recollections as well from patriotism as self-respect. Ours, sir, is now the duty, in the midst of sadness, in this high place, in the face of our Republic, and before the world, to pay this tribute by acknowledging the merits of our colleague whose name has ornamented the Journals of Congress for near half a century. Few, very few, have ever combined the high intellectual powers and distinguished gifts of this illustrious Senator. Cast in the finest mould by nature, he more than fulfilled the anticipations which were indulged by those who looked to a distinguished career as the certain result of that zealous pursuit of fame and usefulness upon which he entered in early life. Of the incidents of that life it is unnecessary for me to speak—they are as familiar as household words, and must be equally familiar to those who come after us. But it is useful to refresh memory by recurrence to some of the events which marked his career. We know, sir, that there is much that is in common in the histories of distinguished men. The elements which constitute greatness are the same in all times; hence those who have been the admiration of their generations present in their lives much which, although really great, ceases to be remarkable, because illustrated by such numerous examples—

"But there are deeds which should not pass away,
And names that must not wither."

Of such deeds the life of HENRY CLAY affords many and bright examples. His own name, and those with whom he associated, shall live with a freshness which time cannot impair, and shine with a brightness which passing years cannot dim. His advent into public life was as remarkable for the circumstances as it was brilliant in its effect. It was at a time in which genius and learning, statesmanship and eloquence, made the American Congress the most august body in the world. He was the cotemporary of a race of statesmen—some of whom then administering the Government, and others retiring and retired from office—presented an array of ability unsurpassed in our history. The elder Adams, Jefferson, Madison, Clinton, Gallatin, and Monroe, stood before the Republic in the maturity of their fame; whilst Calhoun, John Quincy Adams, Lowndes, Crawford, Gaston, Randolph, and Cheves, with a host of others, rose a bright galaxy upon our horizon. He who won his spurs in such a field earned his knighthood. Distinction amidst such competition was true renown—

"The fame which a man wins for himself is best—
That he may call his own."

It was such a fame that he made for himself in that most eventful era in our history. To me, sir, the recollections of that day, and the events which distinguish it, is filled with an overpowering interest. I never can forget my enthusiastic admiration of the boldness, the eloquence, and the patriotism of HENRY CLAY during the war of 1812. In the bright array of talent which adorned the Congress of the United States; in the conflict growing out of the political events of that time; in the struggles of party, and amidst the gloom and disasters which depressed the spirits of most men, and well-nigh paralyzed the energies of the Administration, his cheerful face, high bearing, commanding eloquence and iron will, gave strength and consistency to those elements which finally gave not only success but glory to the country. When dark clouds hovered over us, and there was little to save from despair, the country looked with hope to Clay and Calhoun, to Lowndes, and Crawford, and Cheves, and looked not in vain. The unbending will, the unshaken nerve, and the burning eloquence of HENRY CLAY did as much to command confidence and sustain hope as even the news of our first victory after a succession of defeats. Those great names are now canonized in history; he, too, has passed to join them on its pages. Associated in his long political life with the illustrious Calhoun, he survived him but two years. Many of us heard his eloquent tribute to his memory in the Senate Chamber on the announcement of his death. And we this day unite in a similar manifestation of reverential regard to him whose voice shall never more charm the ear, whose burning thoughts, borne on that medium, shall no more move the hearts of listening assemblies.

In the midst of the highest specimens of our race, he was always an equal; he was a man amongst men. Bold, skilful, and determined, he gave character to the party which acknowledged him as a leader; impressed his opinions upon their minds, and an attachment to himself upon their hearts. No man, sir, can do this without being eminently great. Whoever attains this position must first overcome the aspirations of antagonist ambition, quiet the clamors of rivalry, hold in check the murmurs of jealousy, and overcome the instincts of vanity and self-love in the masses thus subdued to his control. But few men ever attain it. Very rare are the examples of those whose plastic touch forms the minds and directs the purposes of a great political party. This infallible indication of superiority belonged to Mr. CLAY. He has exercised that control during a long life; and now through our broad land the tidings of his death, borne with electric speed, have opened the fountains of sorrow. Every city, town, village, and hamlet will be clothed with mourning; along our extended coast, the commercial and military marine, with flags drooping at half-mast, own the bereavement; State-houses draped in black proclaim the extinguishment of one of the great lights of Senates; and minute-guns sound his requiem!

Sir, during the last five years I have seen the venerable John Quincy Adams, John C. Calhoun, and HENRY CLAY pass from amongst us, the legislators of our country. The race of giants who "were on the earth in those days" is well-nigh gone. Despite their skill, their genius, their might, they have sunk under the stroke of time. They were our admiration and our glory; a few linger with us, the monuments of former greatness, the beacon-lights of a past age. The death of HENRY CLAY cannot fail to suggest melancholy associations to each member of this House. These walls have reached the silvery tones of his bewitching voice; listening assemblies have hung upon his lips. The chair which you fill has been graced by his presence, whilst his commanding person and unequalled parliamentary attainments inspired all with deference and respect. Chosen by acclamation because of his high qualifications, he sustained himself before the House and the country. In his supremacy with his party, and the uninterrupted confidence which he enjoyed to the day of his death, he seems to have almost discredited the truth of those lines addressed to Cæsar—

"Non possunt primi esse omnes omni in tempore, Summum ad gradum cum claritas veneris,
Consistes ægre, et citius, quam ascendas, cades."<sup>228</sup>

If not at all times first, he stood equal with the foremost, and a brilliant rapid rise knew no decline in the confidence of those whose just appreciation of his merits had confirmed his title to renown.

The citizens of other countries will deplore his death; the struggling patriots who on our own continent were cheered by his sympathies, and who must have perceived his influence in the recognition of their independence by this Government, have taught their children to venerate his name. He won the civic crown, and the demonstrations of this hour own the worth of civil services.

It was with great satisfaction that I heard my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE,] the immediate representative of Mr. CLAY, detail a conversation which disclosed the feelings of that eminent man in relation to his Christian hope. These, Mr. Speaker, are rich memorials, precious reminiscences. A Christian statesman is the glory of his age, and his memory will be glorious in after times; it reflects a light coming from a source which clouds cannot dim nor shadows obscure. It was my privilege, also, a short time since, to converse with this distinguished statesman on the subject of his hopes in a future state. Feeling a deep interest, I asked him frankly what were his hopes in the world to which he was evidently hastening. "I am pleased," said he, "my friend, that you have introduced the subject. Conscious that I must die very soon, I love to meditate upon the most important of all interests. I love to converse and to hear conversations about them. The vanity of the world and its insufficiency to satisfy the soul of man has been long a settled conviction of my mind. Man's inability to secure by his own merits the approbation of God, I feel to be true. I trust in the atonement of the Saviour of men as the ground of my acceptance and my hope of salvation. My faith is feeble, but I hope in His mercy and trust in His promises." To such declarations I listened with the deepest interest, as I did on another occasion, when he said: "I am willing to abide the will of Heaven, and ready to die when that will shall determine it."

He is gone, sir, professing the humble hope of a Christian. That hope, alone, sir, can sustain you, or any of us. There is one lonely and crushed heart that has bowed before this afflictive event. Far away, at Ashland, a widowed wife, prevented by feeble health from attending his bedside and soothing his painful hours, she has thought even the electric speed of the intelligence daily transmitted of his condition too slow for her aching, anxious bosom. She will find consolation in his Christian submission, and will draw all of comfort that such a case admits from the assurance that nothing was neglected by the kindness of friends which could supply her place. May the guardianship of the widow's God be her protection, and His consolations her support!

Mr. HAVEN said: Mr. Speaker, representing a constituency distinguished for the constancy of its devotion to the political principles of Mr. CLAY, and for its unwavering attachment to his fortunes and his person—sympathizing deeply with those whose more intimate personal relations with him have made them feel most profoundly this general bereavement—I desire to say a few words of him, since he has fallen amongst us, and been taken to his rest.

After the finished eulogies which have been so eloquently pronounced by the honorable gentlemen who have preceded me, I will avoid a course of remark which might otherwise be deemed a repetition, and refer to the bearing of some of the acts of the deceased upon the interests and destinies of my own State. The influence of his public life, and of his purely American character, the benefits of his wise forecast, and the results of his efforts for wholesome and rational progress, are nowhere more strongly exhibited than in the State of New York.

Our appreciation of his anxiety for the general diffusion of knowledge and education, is manifested in our twelve thousand public libraries, our equal number of common schools, and a large number of higher institutions of learning—all of which drew portions of their support from the share of the proceeds of the public lands, which his wise policy gave to our State. Our whole people are thus constantly reminded of their great obligations to the statesman whose death now afflicts the nation with sorrow. Our extensive public works attest our conviction of the utility and importance of the system of internal improvements he so ably advocated; and their value and productiveness afford a most striking evidence of the soundness and wisdom of his policy. Nor has his influence been less sensibly felt in our agriculture, commerce, and manufactures. Every department of human industry acknowledges his fostering care, and the people of New York are, in no small measure, indebted to his statesmanship for the wealth, comfort, contentment, and happiness so widely and generally diffused throughout the State.

Well may New York cherish his memory and acknowledge with gratitude the benefits that his life has conferred. That memory will be cherished throughout the Republic.

When internal discord and sectional strife have threatened the integrity of the Union, his just weight of character, his large experience, his powers of conciliation and acknowledged patriotism, have enabled him to pacify the angry passions of his countrymen, and to raise the bow of promise and of hope upon the clouds which have darkened the political horizon.

He has passed from amongst us, ripe in wisdom and pure in character—full of years and full of honors. He has breathed his last amidst the blessings of a united and a grateful nation.

He was, in my judgment, particularly fortunate in the time of his death.

He lived to see his country, guided by his wisdom, come once again unhurt out of trying sectional difficulties and domestic strife; and he has closed his eyes in death upon that country whilst it is in the enjoyment of profound peace, busy with industry, and blessed with unequalled prosperity.

It can fall to the lot of but few to die amidst so warm a gratitude flowing from the hearts of their countrymen; and none can leave a brighter example or a more enduring fame.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to add my humble tribute to the memory of a great and good man now to be gathered to his fathers. I speak for, and from a community, in whose hearts is enshrined the name of him whom we mourn; who, however much Virginia, the land of his birth, or Kentucky, the land of his adoption, may love him, is, if possible, loved where I live yet more. If idolatry had been Christian, or allowable even, he would have been our idol. But, as it is, for a quarter of a century now, his bust, his portrait, or some medal, has been one of our household gods, gracing not alone the saloon, and the halls of wealth, but the humblest room or workshop of almost every mechanic or laborer. Proud monuments of his policy as a statesman, as my colleague has just said, are all about us, and we owe to him, in a good degree, our growth, our greatness, our prosperity, and happiness as a people.

The great field of HENRY CLAY, Mr. Speaker, has been here, on the floor of this House, and in the other wing of the Capitol. He has held other posts of higher nominal distinction; but they are all eclipsed by the brilliancy of his career as a Congressman. What of glory he has acquired, what most endear him to his countrymen, have been won here, amid these pillars, under these domes of the Capitol.

Si queris monumentum circumspecte,

The mind of Mr. CLAY has been the governing mind of the country, more or less, ever since he has been on the stage of public action. In a minority, or a majority—more, perhaps, even in a minority than in the majority—he seems to have had some commission, divine as it were, to persuade, to convince, to govern other men. His patriotism, his foresight, his grand conceptions, have created measures which the secret fascination of his manners, in door, or his irresistible eloquence without, has enabled him almost always to frame into laws.

Adverse Administrations have yielded to him, or been borne down by him, or he has taken them captive as a leader, and carried the country and Congress with him. This power he has wielded now for nearly half a century, with nothing but reason and eloquence to back him. And yet, when he came here, years ago, he came from a then frontier State of this Union, heralded by no loud trumpet of fame, nay, quite unknown, unfortified even by any position, social or pecuniary; to quote his own words, his only "heritage had been infancy, indigence, and ignorance."

In these days, Mr. Speaker, when mere civil qualifications for high public place—when long civil training and practical statesmanship are held subordinate—a most discouraging prospect would be before our rising young men, were it not for some such names as Lowndes, Crawford, Clinton, Gaston, Calhoun, and Clay, scattered along the pages of our history, as stars or constellations in a cloudless sky. They shine forth, and show us that if the Chief Magistracy cannot be won by such qualifications, a memory among men can be—a hold upon posterity, as firm, as lustrous—nay, more imperishable. In the Capitolium of Rome there are long rows of marble slabs, on which are recorded the names of the Roman Consuls; but the eye wanders over this wilderness of letters but to light up and to kindle upon some Cato or Cicero. To win such fame, thus unsullied, as Mr. CLAY has won, is worth any man's ambition. And how was it won? By courting the shifting gales of popularity? No, never! By truckling to the schemes, the arts, and seductions of the demagogue? Never, never! His hardest battles as a public man—his greatest, most illustrious achievements—have been against, at first, an adverse public opinion. To gain an imperishable name, he has often braved the perishable popularity of the moment. That sort of courage which, in a public man, I deem the highest of all courage; that sort of courage most necessary under our form of government to guide as well as to save a State, Mr. CLAY was possessed of—more than any public man I ever knew. Mere physical courage, valuable, indispensable though it be, we share but with the brute—but moral courage, to dare to do right, amid all temptations to do wrong, is, as it seems to me, the very highest species, the noblest heroism, under institutions like ours. "I had rather be right than be President," was Mr. CLAY's sublime reply when pressed to refrain from some measure that would mar his popularity. These lofty words were a clue to his whole character—the secret of his hold upon the heads as well as hearts of the American people—nay, the key to his immortality.

Another of the keys, Mr. Speaker, of his universal reputation, was his intense nationality. When taunted but recently, almost within our hearing, as it were, on the floor of the Senate, by a Southern Senator, as being a Southern man unfaithful to the South, his indignant but patriotic exclamation was: "I know no South—no North, no East, no West." The country, the whole country loved, revered, adored such a man. The soil of Virginia may be his birth place: the sod of Kentucky will cover his grave—what was mortal they claim—but the spirit, the soul, the genius of the mighty man, the immortal part, these belong to his country and to his God.

Mr. FAULKNER. After the many able and eloquent addresses to which we have listened this morning, I fear, sir, that it will not be in my <sup>228</sup> "All cannot be at all times first;

To reach the topmost step of glory; to stand there
More hard. Even swifter than we mount we fall."

power to add anything to the interest of this occasion. And yet, representing as I do in part that State which gave birth to the distinguished man whose death has this day been announced on this floor, and having for many years held towards him the most cordial relations of friendship, personal and political, I feel that I should fail to discharge an appropriate duty, if I permitted this occasion to pass by, without some expression of the feeling which such an event is so well calculated to elicit. It is true, sir, that this intelligence does not fall upon our ears unexpectedly; for months the public mind has been prepared for the great national loss which we now deplore; and yet, as familiar as the daily and hourly reports have made us with his hopeless condition, and gradual decline, and although it is impossible that a light of such surpassing splendor should be, as it is now, forever extinguished from our view, without producing a shock, deeply and painfully felt to the utmost limits of this great Republic. Sir, we all feel that a mighty intellect has passed from amongst us; but, happily for this country, happily for mankind, not until it had accomplished to some extent the exalted mission for which it had been sent upon this earth—not until it had reached the full maturity of its usefulness and power—not until it had shed a bright and radiant luster over our national renown—not until time had enabled it to bequeath the rich treasures of its thought and experience for the guidance and instruction of the present, and of succeeding generations.

"Like a shadow thrown Softly and sweetly from a passing cloud, Death fell upon him,"

Sir, it is difficult—it is impossible—within the limit allowed for remarks upon occasions of this kind, to do justice to a great historical character like HENRY CLAY. He was one of that class of men whom Scaliger designates as homines centurarii—men that appear upon the earth but once in a century. His fame is the growth of years, and it would require time to unfold the elements which have combined to impart to it so much of stability and grandeur. Volumes have already been written, and volumes will continue to be written, to record those eminent and distinguished public services which have placed him in the front rank of American statesmen and patriots. The highest talent, fired by a fervid and patriotic enthusiasm, has already and will continue to exhaust its powers, to portray those striking and generous incidents of his life, those shining and captivating qualities of his heart, which have made him one of the most beloved, as he was one of the most admired of men; and yet the subject itself will remain as fresh and exhaustless as if hundreds of the best intellects of the land had not quaffed the inspiration of their genius from the evergushing and overflowing fountains of his fame. It is impossible that a reputation so grand and colossal as that which attaches to the name of HENRY CLAY, could rest for its base upon any single virtue, however striking, nor upon any single act, no matter how marked or distinguished. Such a reputation as he has left behind him could only be the result of a long life of illustrious public service. And such it truly was. For nearly half a century he has been a prominent actor in all the stirring and eventful scenes of American history; fashioning and moulding many of the most important measures of public policy by his bold and sagacious mind, and arresting others by his unconquerable energy and resistless force of eloquence. And however much the members of this body may differ in opinion as to the wisdom of many of his views of national domestic policy, there is not one upon this floor—no, sir, not one in this nation—who will deny to him frankness and directness as a public man—a genius for statesmanship of the highest order—extraordinary capacities for public usefulness, and an ardent and elevated patriotism, without stain and without reproach.

In referring to a career of public service so varied and extended as that of Mr. CLAY, and to a character so rich in every great and manly virtue, it is only possible to glance at a few of the most prominent of those points of his personal history which have given to him so distinguished a place in the affections of his countrymen.

In the whole character of Mr. CLAY, in all that attached or belonged to it, you find nothing that is not essentially AMERICAN. Born in the darkest period of our revolutionary struggle—reared from infancy to manhood amongst those great minds which gave the first impulse to that mighty movement, he early imbibed and sedulously cherished those great principles of civil and political liberty, which he so brilliantly illustrated in his subsequent public career, and which has made his name a watchword of hope and consolation to the oppressed of all the earth. In his intellectual training he was the pure creation of our own republican soil. Few, if any allusions are to be seen in his speeches or writings to ancient or modern literature, or to the thoughts and ideas of other men. His country—its institutions—its policy—its interests—its destiny form the exclusive topics of these eloquent harangues which, whilst they are destitute of the elaborate finish, have all the ardor and intensity of thought—the earnestness of purpose, the cogency of reasoning, the vehemence of style, and the burning patriotism which mark the productions of the great Athenian orator.

One of the most distinguishing characteristics of Mr. CLAY as a public man, was his loyalty to truth and to the honest convictions of his own mind. He deceived no man—he would not permit his own heart to be deceived by any of those seductive influences which too often warp the judgment of men in public life. He never paused to consider how far any step which he was about to take would lead to his own personal advancement; he never calculated what he might lose or what he might gain by his advocacy of, or his opposition to, any particular measure. His single inquiry was, Is it right? Is it in accordance with the Constitution of the land? Will it redound to the permanent welfare and interest of the country? When satisfied upon these points, his determination was fixed—his purpose was immovable. "I would rather be right than President," was the expression of his genuine feelings; and the principle by which he was controlled in his public career—a saying worthy of immortality, and proper to be inscribed upon the heart of every young man in this Republic. And yet, sir, with all of that personal and moral intrepidity which so eminently marked the character of Mr. CLAY—with his well-known inflexibility of purpose, and unyielding determination—such was the genuine sincerity of his patriotism, and such his thorough comprehension of those principles of compromise upon which the whole structure of our Government was founded, that no one was more prompt to relax the rigor of his policy the moment he perceived that it was calculated to disturb the harmony of the States, or endanger in any degree, the stability of the Government. With him, the love of this Union was a passion—an absorbing sentiment which gave color to every act of his public life. It triumphed over party; it triumphed over policy; it subdued the natural fierceness and haughtiness of his temper and brought him into the most kindly and cordial relations with all those who, upon all other questions were deeply and bitterly opposed to him. It has been asserted, sir, upon high medical authority, and doubtless with truth, that his life was, in all probability, shortened ten years by the arduous and extraordinary labors which he assumed at the memorable session of 1850. If so, he has added the crowning glory of the MARTYR to the spotless fame of the PATRIOT; and we may well hope that a great national pacification, purchased at such a sacrifice, will long continue to cement the bonds of this great and glorious Union.

Mr. CLAY possessed, in an eminent degree, the qualities of a great popular leader, and history, I will assume to say, affords no example, in any Republic, ancient or modern, of any individual that so fearlessly carried out the convictions of his own judgment, and so sparingly flattered the prejudices of popular feeling, who for so long a period, exercised the same controlling influence over the public mind. Earnest in whatever measure he sustained—fearless in attack—dexterous in defense—abounding in intellectual resource—eloquent in debate—of inflexible purpose, and with a "courage never to submit or yield," no man ever lived with higher qualifications to rally a desponding party, or to lead an embattled host to victory. That he never attained the highest post of honorable ambition in this country, is not to be ascribed to any want of capacity as a popular leader; nor the absence of those qualities which attract the fidelity and devotion of "troops" of admiring friends. It was the fortune of Napoleon, at a critical period of his destiny, to be brought into collision with the star of Wellington, and it was the fortune of HENRY CLAY to have encountered, in his political orbit, another great and original mind, gifted with equal power for commanding success, and blessed with more fortunate elements, concurring at the time, of securing popular favor. The struggle was such as might have been anticipated from the collision of two such fierce and powerful rivals.

For near a quarter of a century, this great Republic has been convulsed to its center by the divisions which have sprung from their respective opinions, policy, and personal destinies; and even now, when they have both been removed to a higher and better sphere of existence, and every unkind feeling has been quenched in the triumphs of the grave, this country still feels, and for years will continue to feel, the influence of these agitations to which their powerful and impressive characters gave impulse.

But I must pause. If I were to attempt to present all the aspects in which the character of this illustrious man will challenge the applause of history, I should fatigue the House and violate the just limit allowed for such remarks.

I cannot conclude, however, without making some more special allusion to Mr. CLAY, as a native of that State which I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor. We are all proud, and very properly proud of the distinguished men to which our respective States have given birth. It is a just and laudable emulation, and one in a confederated government like ours, proper to be encouraged. And whilst men like Mr. CLAY very rapidly rise above the confined limits of a State reputation and acquire a national fame, in which all claim and all have an equal interest, still there is a propriety and fitness in preserving the relation between the individual and his State. Virginia has given birth to a large number of men who have by their distinguished talents and services impressed their names upon the hearts and memories of their countrymen; but, certainly, since the colonial era she has given birth to no man who in the massive and gigantic proportions of his character, and in the splendor of his native endowments, can be compared to HENRY CLAY. At an early age he emigrated from his native State, and found a home in Kentucky. In a speech which he delivered in the Senate of the United States in February, 1842, and which I well remember, upon the occasion of his resigning his seat in that body, he expressed the wish that when that event should occur, which has now clothed the city in mourning, and filled the nation with grief, "that his earthly remains should be laid under the green sod of Kentucky, with those of her gallant and patriotic sons."

Sir, however gratifying it might be to us that those remains should be transferred to his native soil, and there mingle with the ashes of Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Lee, and Henry, we cannot complain of the very natural preference which he has there himself expressed. If Virginia did give him birth, Kentucky has nourished him in his manhood—has freely lavished upon him her highest honors—has shielded him from harm when the clouds of calumny and detraction gathered heavily and loweringly about him, and she has watched over his fame with the tenderness and zeal of a mother. Sir, it is not to be wondered that he should have expressed the wish which he did, to be laid by the side of her gallant and patriotic sons. Happy Kentucky! Happy in having an adopted son so worthy of her best honors. Happy in the unshaken fidelity and loyalty with which, for near half a century, those honors have been so steadfastly and gracefully accorded to him.

Sir, whilst Virginia, in the exercise of her own just judgment, has differed from Mr. CLAY in some of his views of national policy, she has never at any period of his public career, failed to regard him with pride as one of her most distinguished sons; to honor the purity and the manliness of his character, and to award to him the high credit of an honest and sincere devotion to his country's welfare. And now, sir, that death has extinguished forever the workings of that mighty intellect, and sealed in eternal silence those eloquent lips upon whose accents thousands have so often hung in rapture, I shall stand justified in saying that a wail of lamentation will be heard from her people—her whole people, reverberating through her mountains and valleys, as deep, as genuine, and as sincere as that which I know will swell the noble hearts and the heaving bosoms of the people of his own cherished and beloved Kentucky.

Sir, as I walked to the Capitol this morning, every object which attracted my eye admonished me that a national benefactor had departed from amongst us. He is gone! HENRY CLAY, the idol of his friends, the ornament of the Senate Chamber, the pride of his country, he whose presence gathered crowds of his admiring fellow-men around him, as if he had been one descended from above, has passed forever from our view.

"His soul, enlarged from its vile bonds, has gone
To that refulgent world where it shall swim
In liquid light, and float on seas of bliss."

But the memory of his virtues and of his services will be gratefully embalmed in the hearts of his countrymen, and generations yet unborn will be taught to hush with reverence and enthusiasm the name of HENRY CLAY.

Mr. PARKER, of Indiana, said: Mr. Speaker, this is a solemn—a consecrated hour. And I would not detain the members of the House from indulging in the silent eloquence of their own feelings, so grateful to hearts chastened as ours.

But I cannot restrain an expression from a bosom pained with its fullness.

When my young thoughts first took cognizance of the fact that I have a country—my eye was attracted by the magnificent proportions of HENRY CLAY.

The idea absorbed me then, that he was, above all other men, the embodiment of my country's genius.

I have watched him; I have studied him; I have admired him—and, God forgive me! for he was but a man, "of like passions with us"—I fear I have idolized him, until this hour.

But he has gone from among men; and it is for us now to awake and apply ourselves, with renewed fervor and increased fidelity, to the welfare of the country, he loved so well and served so truly and so long—the glorious country yet saved to us!

Yes, HENRY CLAY has fallen, at last!—as the ripe oak falls, in the stillness of the forest. But the verdant and gorgeous richness of his glories will only fade and wither from the earth, when his country's history shall have been forgotten.

"One generation passeth away and another generation cometh." Thus it hath been from the beginning; and thus it will be, until time shall be no longer.

Yesterday morning, at eleven o'clock, the spirit of HENRY CLAY—so long the pride and glory of his own country, and the admiration of all the world—was yet with us, though struggling to be free. Ere "high noon" came, it had passed over "the dark river," through the gate, into the celestial city, inhabited by all the "just men made perfect."

May not our rapt vision contemplate him there, this day, in sweet communion with the dear friends that have gone before him?—with Madison, and Jefferson, and Washington, and Henry, and Franklin—with the eloquent Tully, with the "divine Plato," with Aaron, the Levite, who could "speak well"—with all the great and good, since and before the flood!

His princely tread has graced these aisles for the last time. These Halls will wake no more to the magic music of his voice.

Did that tall spirit, in its ethereal form, enter the courts of the upper sanctuary, bearing itself comparably with the spirits there, as was his walk among men?

Did the mellifluous tones of his greeting there enrapture the hosts of Heaven, comparably with his strains "to stir men's blood" on earth?

Then, may we not fancy, when it was announced to the inhabitants of that better country: HE COMES!—HE COMES!—there was a rustling of angel-wings—a thrilling joy—up there, only to be witnessed once in an earthly age?

Adieu!—a last adieu to thee, HENRY CLAY!

The hearts of all thy countrymen are melted, on this day, because of the thought that thou art gone.

Could we have held the hand of the "insatiate archer," thou hadst not died; but thou wouldst have tarried with us, in the full grandeur of thy greatness, until we had no longer need of a country.

But we thank our Heavenly Father that thou wast given to us; and that thou didst survive so long.

We would cherish thy memory while we live, as our country's JEWEL—than which none is richer. And we will teach our children the lessons of matchless patriotism thou hast taught us; with the fond hope that our LIBERTY and our UNION may only expire with "the last of earth."

Mr. GENTRY said: Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to pronounce an eulogy on the life and character and public services of the illustrious orator and statesman whose death this nation deplores. Suitably to perform that task, a higher eloquence than I possess might essay in vain. The gushing tears of the nation, the deep grief which oppresses the hearts of more than twenty millions of people, constitute a more eloquent eulogium upon the life and character and patriotic services of HENRY CLAY, than the power of language can express. In no part of our country is that character more admired, or those public services more appreciated, than in the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent. I claim for the people of that State a full participation in the general woe which the sad announcement of to-day will everywhere inspire.

Mr. BOWIE. I rise not to utter the measured phrases of premeditated woe, but to speak as would my constituents speak, if they stood around the grave now opened to receive the mortal remains not of a statesman only but of a beloved friend. If there is a State in this Union, other than Kentucky, which sends up a wail of more bitter and sincere sorrow than another, that State is Maryland. In her midst this departed statesman was a frequent and a welcome guest. At many a board, and many a fireside, his noble form was the light of the eyes and the idol of the heart. Throughout her borders, in cottage, hamlet, and cities, his name is a household word, his thoughts are familiar sentences. Though not permitted to be first at his cradle, Maryland would be last at his tomb. Through all the phases of political fortune—amid all the storms which darkened his career, Maryland cherished him in her inmost heart, as the most gifted, patriotic, and eloquent of men; and for him daily, to this hour, prayers ascend, night and morning, for his temporal and eternal welfare. Maryland would, in the language of inspiration, exclaim, "This day hath a prince and ruler fallen in Israel!" Daughters of America weep for him who hath "clothed you in scarlet and fine linen!"

The husbandman at his plough, the artisan at the anvil, the seaman on the mast, will pause and drop a tear when he hears that CLAY is no more.

The advocate for freedom in both hemispheres, he will be lamented alike on the shores of the Hellespont and the banks of the Mississippi and Orinoco. The freed men of Liberia, learning and practicing the art of self-government, and civilizing Africa, have lost a patron and protector, a father and friend. America mourns the departure of a luminary, which enlightened and illustrated the continent; the United States, a counsellor of deep wisdom and purest purpose; mankind, the advocate of human rights and constitutional liberty.

Mr. WALSH said: Mr. Speaker, the illustrious man whose death we this day mourn, was so long my political leader,—so long almost the object of my personal idolatry, that I cannot allow that he shall go down to the grave, without a word at least of affectionate remembrance,—without a tribute to a memory, which will exact tributes as long as a heart shall be found to beat within the bosom of civilized man, and human agency shall be adequate in any form to give them an expression; and even, sir, if I had no heart-felt sigh to pour out here—if I had no tear for that coffin's lid, I should do injustice to those whose representative in part I am, if I did not in this presence, and at this time, raise the voice to swell the accents of the profoundest public sorrow.

The State of Maryland has always vied with Kentucky, in love and adoration of his name. Her people have gathered around him, with all the fervor of a first affection, and with more than its duration. Troops of friends have ever clustered about his pathway with a personal devotion, which each man of them regarded as the highest individual honor,—friends, sir, to whose firesides the tidings of his death will go with all the withering influences which are felt when household ties are severed.

I wish, sir, I could offer now a proper memorial for such a subject, and such an affection. But as I strive to utter it, I feel the disheartening influence of the well known truth, that in view of death all minds sink into triteness. It would seem, indeed, sir, that the great leveler of our race would vindicate his title to be so considered, by making all men think alike in regard to his visitation—"The thousand thoughts that begin and end in one,"—the desolation here—the eternal Hope here—after—are influences felt alike by the lowest intellect and the loftiest genius.

Mr. Chairman, a statesman for more than fifty years in the councils of his country, whose peculiar charge it was to see that the Republic suffered no detriment—a patriot for all times, all circumstances, and all emergencies, has passed away from the trials and triumphs of the world, and gone to his reward. Sad as are the emotions which such an event would ordinarily excite, their intensity is deeply heightened by the matters so fresh within the memories of us all:

"Oh! think how to his latest day,
When Death, just hovering, claim'd his prey,
With Palmurus' unaltered mood,
Firm at his dangerous post he stood,
Each call for needful rest repell'd,
With dying hand the rudder held;
Then, while on freedom's thousand plains
One unpolluted church remains,
Whose peaceful bells ne'er sent around
The bloody tocsin's maddening sound;
But still, upon the hallow'd day
Convoke the swains to praise and pray;
While faith and civil peace are dear,
Greet his cold marble with a tear,
He who preserved them—Clay lies here."

In a character, Mr. Speaker, so illustrious and beautiful, it is difficult to select any point for particular notice from those which go to make up its noble proportions; but we may now around his honored grave, call to grateful recollection that invincible spirit which no personal sorrow could sully, and no disaster could overcome. Be assured, sir, that he has in this regard left a legacy to the young men of the Republic almost as sacred and as dear as that liberty of which his life was a blessed illustration.

We can all remember, sir, when adverse political results disheartened his friends, and made them feel even as men without hope, his own clarion voice was still heard in the purpose and the pursuit of rights, as bold and as eloquent as when it first proclaimed the freedom of the seas, and its talismanic tones struck off the badges of bondage from the lands of the Incas and the plains of Marathon.

Mr. Speaker, in the exaltation of the statesman he did not forget the duties of the man. He was an affectionate adviser on all points wherein inexperienced youth might require counsel. He was a disinterested sympathiser in personal sorrows that called for consolation. He was ever upright and honorable in all the duties incident to his relations in life.

To an existence so lovely Heaven in its mercy granted a fitting and appropriate close. It was the prayer, Mr. Speaker, of a distinguished citizen who died some years since in the metropolis, even while his spirit was fluttering for its final flight, that he might depart gracefully. It may not be presumptuous to say that what was in that instance the aspiration of a chivalric gentleman, was in this the realization of the dying Christian, in which was blended all that human dignity could require, with all that Divine Grace had conferred; in which the firmness of the man was only transcended by the fervor of the penitent.

A short period before his death, he remarked to one by his bed-side, "That he was fearful he was becoming selfish, as his thoughts were entirely withdrawn from the world, and centered upon eternity." This, sir, was but the purification of his noble spirit from all the dross of earth—a happy illustration of what the religious muse has so sweetly sung—

"No sin to stain—no lure to stay
The soul, as home she springs;
Thy sunshine on her joyful way,
Thy freedom in her wings."

Mr. Speaker, the solemnities of this hour may soon be forgotten. We may come back from the new-made grave only still to show that we consider "eternity the bubble life and time the enduring substance." We may not pause long enough by the brink to ask which of us revelers of a day shall next beat rest. But beassured, sir, that upon the records of mortality will never be inscribed a name more illustrious than that of the statesman, patriot, and friend whom the nation mourns.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks leave to give notice to the House, that the members of the Senate and House will form a procession at the National Hotel to-morrow, at twenty minutes past eleven, to accompany the remains of Mr. CLAY to the Capitol for funeral ceremonies. The remains will pass thence to the cars, and depart for Kentucky.

The question was then put on the adoption of the resolutions proposed by Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, and they were unanimously adopted.

And the House adjourned till to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, July 1, 1852.

The funeral rites over the remains of the Hon. HENRY CLAY were solemnized this day. Pursuant to the arrangements prescribed by the committee of the Senate, the members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, together with public bodies and associations, military companies, and civic authorities, assembled at the National Hotel, where the body has lain since life departed; and thence the melancholy funeral cortege passed to the Senate Chamber, so long the theatre of his glories.

As the body was borne to the centre of the Chamber, the Rev. Dr. BUTLER, the Chaplain to the Senate, in full canonicals, read part of the Episcopal ritual—"I am the resurrection and the life, saith the Lord." In consonance with the solemn service over the dead was the scene there presented—somber and sad.

The President of the United States and the Speaker of the House of Representatives were seated with the President of the Senate. The body of the Senate, the representatives of State sovereignties, were grouped, on the two innermost semicircular rows of chairs, around the lifeless form of their late colleague. The committee of arrangements, and the committee to convey the body to Kentucky, and the pall-bearers, with the Kentucky delegation in the House of Representatives, as chief mourners, and a few personal devoted friends, were also in close proximity to the inanimate form of the deceased.

The members of the House of Representatives filled the outer circles, except such parts as were devoted to the large diplomatic corps, the Cabinet of the President of the United States, the officers of the Army and Navy, amongst whom were Major General Scott, commander-in-chief, and Commodore Morris. With the Municipal Councils of the city of Washington, were the officers of neighboring cities, and others, official and unofficial.

Mr. James Maher, the public gardiner, placed a fragrant shield of sweetly-culled flowers upon the sarcophagus, as a memorial of affection for the deceased statesman within. The pure white and brightly-variegated flowers contrasted sadly with the rich folding drapery of black cloth, relieved though it was by silver ornaments. The sarcophagus in which the remains were inurned, resembles the outlines of the human body. The handles, the face plate, the plate for inscribing the name, and other plates, are of massive silver, beautifully wrought and chased, having appropriate emblems, among which appear wreaths of laurel and oak, with a full-blown rose, and sprig of oak with its acorns detached from their parent stem, showing the work of the fell destroyer. Amidst the contemplations to which this scene gave being, the Chaplain's voice broke on the listening ear—

"But some man will say, how are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come?" The answer was furnished by the residue of the 15th chapter of 1st Corinthians, which the Chaplain impressively read for the consolation of the bereaved living.

"How is the strong staff broken and the beautiful rod?" (Jeremiah 48 ch. 17 v.) was the suggestive text of the following impressive discourse:

Before all hearts and minds in this august assemblage the vivid image of ONE MAN stands. To some aged eye he may come forth, from the dim past, as he appeared in the neighboring city of his native State, a little and ardent youth, full of promise, of ambition, and of hope. To another he may appear as, in a distant State, in the courts of justice, erect, highstrung, bold, wearing fresh forensic laurels on his young and open brow. Some may see him in the earlier and some in the later stages of his career on this auspicious theatre of his renown; and to the former he will start out, on the background of the past, as he appeared in the neighboring Chamber, tall, elate, impassioned, with flashing eye and suasive gesture, and clarion voice, an already acknowledged "Agamemnon, King of Men;" and to others he will again stand in this Chamber "the strong staff" of the bewildered and staggering State, and "the beautiful rod," rich with the blossoms of genius, and of patriotic love and hope, the life of youth still remaining to give animation, grace, and exhaustless vigor to the wisdom, the experience, and gravity of age. To others he may be present as he sat in the chamber of sickness, cheerful, majestic, gentle—his mind clear, his heart warm, his hope fixed on Heaven, peacefully preparing for his last great change. To the memory of the minister of God he appears as the penitent, humble, and peaceful Christian, who received him with the affection of a father, and joined with him in solemn sacrament and prayer with the gentleness of a woman and humility of a child. "Out of the strong came forth sweetness." "How is the strong staff broken and the beautiful rod!" But not before this assembly only does the venerable image of the departed statesman this day distinctly stand. For more than a thousand miles—East, West, North, and South—it is known and remembered, that at this place and hour a nation's representatives assemble to do honor to him whose fame is now a nation's heritage. A nation's mighty heart throbs against this Capitol, and beats through you. In many cities banners droop, bells toll, cannons boom, funeral draperies wave. In crowded streets and on surrounding wharves, upon steamboats, and upon cars, in fields, in workshops, in homes, in schools, millions of men, women, and children, have their thoughts fixed upon this scene, and say mournfully to each other, "This is the hour in which, at the capital, the nation's representatives are burying HENRY CLAY." Burying HENRY CLAY? Bury the records of your country's history—bury the hearts of living millions—bury the mountains, the rivers, the lakes, and the spreading lands from sea to sea, with which his name is inseparably associated, and even then you would not bury HENRY CLAY—for he is in other lands and speaks in other tongues, and to other times, than ours.

A great mind, a great heart, a great orator, a great career, have been consigned to history. She will record his rare gifts of deep insight, keen discrimination, clear statement, rapid combination, plain, direct, and convincing logic. She will love to dwell on that large, generous, magnanimous, open, forgiving heart. She will linger with fond delight on the recorded or traditional stories of an eloquence that was so masterful and stirring, because it was but himself struggling to come forth on the living words—because, though the words were brave and strong, and beautiful and melodious, it was felt that, behind them, there was a soul, braver, stronger, more beautiful, and more melodious than language could express. She will point to a career of statesmanship which has, to a remarkable degree, stamped itself on the public policy of the country, and reached in beneficent practical results the fields, the looms, the commercial marts, and the quiet homes of all the land, where his name was with the departed father, and is with the living children, and will be with successive generations, an honored household word.

I feel, as a man, the grandeur of this career. But as an immortal, with this broken wreck of mortality before me, with this scene as the "end-all" of human glory, I feel that no career is truly great but that of him who, whether he be illustrious or obscure, lives to the future in the present, and, linking himself to the spiritual world, draws from God the life, the rule, the motive, and the reward of all his labor. So would that great spirit which has departed say to us, could he address us now. So did he realize in the calm and meditative close of life. I feel that I but utter the lessons which, when living, were his last and best convictions, and which, dead, could he speak to us, his solemn admonitions, when I say that statesmanship is then only glorious when it is Christian, and that man is then only safe and true to his duty and his soul, when the life which he lives in the flesh is the life of faith in the Son of God.

Great, indeed, is the privilege, and most honorable and useful is the career of a Christian American statesman.

He perceives that civil liberty came from the freedom wherewith Christ made its earliest martyr and defender free. He recognizes it as one of the twelve manner of fruits on the tree of life with which its lower branches furnish the best nutriment of earth, hangs on its topmost boughs, which wave in heaven, fruits that exhilarate the immortals. Recognizing the State as God's institution, he will perceive that his own ministry is divine. Living consciously under the eye and in the love and fear of God, redeemed by the blood of Jesus, sanctified by His spirit, loving His law, he will give himself, in private and in public, to the service of his Saviour. He will not admit that he may act on less lofty principles in public than in private life, and that he must be careful of his moral influence in the small sphere of home and neighborhood, but need take no heed of it when it stretches over continents and crosses seas. He will know that his moral responsibility cannot be divided and distributed among others. When he is told that adherence to the strictest moral and religious principle is incompatible with a successful and eminent career, he will denounce the assertion as a libel on the venerated father of the Republic—a libel on the honored living, and the illustrious dead—a libel against a great and Christian nation—a libel against God himself, who has declared and made "godliness profitable for the life that is." He will strive to make laws transcripts of the character and institutions, illustrations of the providence of God. He will scan with admiration and awe the purposes of God in the future history of the world, in throwing open their wide continent, from sea to sea, as the abode of freedom, intelligence, plenty, prosperity, and peace, and feel that in giving his energies with a patriotic love to the welfare of his country, he is consecrating himself with a Christian's zeal to the extension and establishment of the Redeemer's kingdom. Compared with a career like this, which is equally open to those whose public sphere is large or small, how paltry are the trade of patriotism, the tricks of statesmanship, the rewards of successful baseness! This hour, this scene, the venerated dead, the country, the world, the present, the future, God, duty, heaven, hell, speak trumpet-tongued to all in the service of their country, to beware how they lay polluted or unhallowed hands

"Upon the ark
Of her magnificent and awful cause."

Such is the character of that statesmanship which alone would have met the full approval of the venerated dead. For the religion which always had a place in the convictions of his mind has also, within a recent period, entered into his experience and seated itself in his heart. Twenty years since he wrote, "I am a member of no religious sect, and I am not a professor of religion. I regret that I am not. I wish that I was, and trust that I shall be. I have, and always have had, a profound regard for Christianity, the religion of my fathers, and for its rites, its usages, and observ-

'ances." That feeling proved that the seed sown by pious parents was not dead, though stifled. A few years since its dormant life was re-awakened. He was baptized in the communion of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and during his sojourn in this city he was in full communion with Trinity parish.

It is since his withdrawal from the sittings of the Senate that I have been made particularly acquainted with his religious opinions, character, and feelings. From his first illness he expressed to me the persuasion that it would be fatal. From that period until his death it has been my privilege to hold with him frequent religious services, and conversations with him in his room. He averred to me his full faith in the great leading doctrines of the Gospel—the fall and sinfulness of man, the divinity of Christ, the reality and necessity of the atonement, the need of being born again by the Spirit, and salvation through faith in the crucified Redeemer. His own personal hopes of salvation he ever and distinctly based on the promises and the grace of Christ. Strikingly perceptible on his naturally impetuous and impatient character was the influence of grace in producing submission and "patient waiting for Christ," and for death. On one occasion he spoke to me of the pious example of one very near and dear to him, as that which led him deeply to feel and earnestly to seek for himself the reality and blessedness of religion. On one occasion he told me that he had been striving to form a conception of Heaven; and he enlarged upon the mercy of that provision by which our Saviour became a partaker of our humanity, that our hearts and hopes might fix themselves on him. On another occasion, when he was supposed to be very near his end, I expressed to him the hope that his mind and heart were at peace, and that he was able to rest with cheerful confidence on the promises and merits of the Redeemer. He said, with much feeling, that he endeavored to, and trusted that he did, repose his salvation upon Christ; that it was too late for him to look at Christianity in the light of speculation; that he had never doubted of its truth; and that he now wished to throw himself upon it as a practical and blessed remedy. Very soon after this, I administered to him the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. Being extremely feeble, and desirous of having his mind undiverted, no persons were present but his son and servant. It was a scene long to be remembered. There, in that still chamber, at a week-day noon, the tides of life all flowing strong around us, three disciples of the Saviour—the minister of God, the dying statesman, and his servant, a partaker of the like precious faith—commemorated their Saviour's dying love. He joined in the blessed sacrament with great feeling and solemnity—now pressing his hands together, and now spreading them forth as the words of the service expressed the feelings, desires, supplications, and thanksgivings of his heart. After this he rallied, and again I was permitted frequently to join with him in religious services, conversation, and prayer. He grew in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Among the books which he read most were Jay's Morning and Evening Exercises, the Life of Dr. Chalmers, and the Christian Philosopher Triumphant in Death. His hope continued to the end, though true and real, to be tremulous with humility rather than rapturous with assurance. When he felt most the weariness of his protracted sufferings, it sufficed to suggest to him that his Heavenly Father doubtless knew that, after a life so long stirring and tempted, such a discipline of chastening and suffering was needful to make him meet for the inheritance of the saints; and at once the words of meek and patient acquiescence escaped his lips.

Exhausted nature at length gave way. On the last occasion when I was permitted to offer a brief prayer at his bed-side, his last words to me were that he had hope only in Christ, and that the prayer which I had offered for his pardoning love and his sanctifying grace included everything which the dying need. On the evening previous to his departure, sitting an hour in silence by his side, I could not but realize, when I heard him in the slight wanderings of his mind to other days, and other scenes, murmuring the words, "My mother! mother! mother!" and saying, "My dear wife," as if she were present; I could not but realize then, and rejoice to think how near was the blessed reunion of his weary heart with the loved dead and with her—our dear Lord gently smooth her passage to the tomb!—who must soon follow him to his rest, whose spirits even then seemed to visit and to cheer his memory and his hope. Gently he breathed his soul away into the spirit world.

"How blest the righteous when they die!
When holy souls retire to rest,
How mildly beams the closing eye!
How gently heaves the expiring breast!"

"So fades a summer cloud away,
So sinks the gale when storms are o'er;
So gently shuts the eye of day;
So dies the wave upon the shore!"

Be it ours to follow him in the same humble and submissive faith to Heaven. Could he speak to us the counsels of his latest human and of his present heavenly experience, sure I am that he would not only admonish us to cling to the Saviour in sickness and in death, but abjure us not to delay to act upon our first convictions that we might give our best power and fullest influence for God, and go to the grave with a hope unshadowed by the long worldliness of the past, and darkened by no films of fear and doubt resting over the future!

The strong staff is broken and the beautiful rod despoiled of its grace and bloom; but in the light of the eternal promises, and by the power of Christ's resurrection, we joyfully anticipate the prospect of seeing that broken staff erect, and that beautiful rod, clothed with celestial grace, and blossoming with undying life and blessedness, in the paradise of God.

The ritual of the Episcopal Church, at the burial of the dead, closed the solemn service, and the body was removed to the Rotunda, that his sorrowing countrymen might gaze upon that face in death which has cheered them so much while living.

At four o'clock the funeral procession left by railroad to give the body sepulture in his own chosen spot, near his own home, at the cemetery of Lexington in Kentucky.

siderations of the importance of the mission and the expenses of residence, transmitting a copy of the circular letter on the subject which was addressed by the Secretary of State to the respective diplomatic representatives of the United States in foreign countries, together with a copy of their replies so far as the same had been received at the Department of State; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

CONVENTION WITH BRAZIL.

Mr. MASON. A bill has been returned from the House of Representatives which has passed the Senate in reference to the Brazilian commission. It has been returned with an amendment. I reported the bill originally, and assent to the amendment, which, I have no doubt, is a proper one. It is important that the bill should be immediately passed, because the commission has expired. I therefore ask the Senate to take up the bill to amend the act entitled "An act to carry into effect the Convention between the United States and the Emperor of Brazil, of the 27th January, 1849," approved March 29, 1850.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was taken up for consideration.

On motion by Mr. MASON, the Senate concurred in the following amendment of the House of Representatives:

Provided, however, That any party who shall desire to avail himself of the provisions of the said eighth section, shall notify the Secretary of the Treasury thereof, within five days from the passage of this act, or from the date of said award of the commissioner to adjust the claim against Brazil.

LAND OFFICE IN MICHIGAN.

On the motion of Mr. FELCH, the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to establish an additional land office in Michigan. It provides for a new district, to be called the "Manitou Land District," and the appointment of a register and receiver of the public moneys.

Several verbal amendments having been made, on the motion of Mr. FELCH, the bill was reported to the Senate, the amendments were concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

PUBLIC EXPENSES IN DES MOINES, IOWA.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. Mr. President, I move that the Senate dispense with the previous order, to take up and consider, at this time, Senate bill No. 406, reported by the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. Downs,] by the unanimous consent of the Committee on the Judiciary.

This bill provides for the payment of a claim of the county of Des Moines, in the State of Iowa, which I think eminently just, and which should have been paid long since.

Mr. DAWSON. I hope the Senate will proceed to consider the bills upon the Calendar.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. I hope my friend from Georgia will not interpose any objection to consider the bill, as I am quite confident there will be no discussion upon the subject, the report having been for some time upon our tables, and the case being one of so clear a character as set forth by the report, which I hope will be read, if he or any Senator shall desire it. The bill only provides for remunerating the county of Des Moines for the payment, by that county, of the ordinary expenses incurred in holding the courts of the United States, under the territorial government of Wisconsin, which then embraced the present State of Iowa, from the year 1836 up to the close of the year 1843. This bill only proposes to pay to Des Moines county, Iowa, for court expenses, which, under precisely similar circumstances, have always been paid to all other counties in the other Territories of the United States, under the interpretation given to the acts creating the Territories, by the accounting officers of the Treasury. But, as I gave assurance, Mr. President, that the bill should not consume many moments of time, I will not say another word in its behalf, and especially as I have made use of my privilege of communicating with Senators on the subject privately.

The motion to take up the bill was agreed to; and it was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to examine the claim presented by the county of Des Moines, in the State of Iowa, and if, upon such examination, he is satisfied that, prior to the first day of January, 1844, the said county has paid money which, in accordance with the instructions of the First Comptroller of the Treasury, dated December 19th, 1843, should have been paid by the marshal of the United States for said Territory, he is directed to audit and allow the same, and the amount is directed to be paid.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time. It was subsequently read a third time and passed.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. BORLAND, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill from the House of Representatives to release from reservation and restore to the mass of public lands, certain lands in the State of Arkansas, reported back the same without amendment.

After a brief explanation of the action of the committee, the bill was read a third time and passed.

Mr. FELCH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which were referred the following bills from the House of Representatives, reported the same back without amendment:

An act to supply a deficiency to the State of Indiana in a township of land granted to said State for the use of a State University, by an act of Congress, approved April 19, 1816; and

An act to appropriate lands for the support of schools in certain townships and fractional townships, in the Territory of Minnesota, not heretofore provided for.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the House of Representatives to extend the provisions of an act, approved March 3, 1847, and an act approved February 26, 1849, for carrying into effect the existing compacts with the States of Alabama and Mississippi, in relation to the five per cent. fund and the school reservations, reported it back with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the petition of John A. Butin, and the petition of Hosea B. Horn and John J. Selman, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, from the Committee on Pensions, to which were referred the documents in relation to the claim of Thomas B. Parsons, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that they be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMS, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the petition of John M. McIntosh, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHIELDS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the petition of Langdon C. Easton, assistant quartermaster in the United States Army, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WADE, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the petition of Peter N. Paillett submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the petition of the legal representatives of Sylvester Day, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for their relief; which was read, and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the petition of Andrew Russmussen, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

BILL PASSED.

The engrossed bill to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the sale of certain military sites," approved March 3, 1819, was read a third time and passed.

Z. F. JOHNSTON.

On motion by Mr. GWIN, the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of Z. F. Johnston.

It proposes to direct the proper accounting officer of the Treasury to audit and pay the accounts of Commander Z. F. Johnston, of the United States Navy, for the necessary and proper personal expenses incurred by him at San Francisco, California, while waiting duty under orders, and compelled to live on shore between the 20th of November, 1848, and the 21st of April, 1849.

The report of the Committee on Naval Affairs was read, from which it appears that Commander Johnston, then at Norfolk, Virginia, was ordered on the 10th April, 1848, by the Secretary of the Navy, to proceed to the Pacific ocean and report to Thomas Ap Catesby Jones for duty in the squadron under his command. In compliance with this order, Commander Johnston reached San Francisco on the 20th of November, 1848, and reported for duty a few days thereafter. Commodore Jones declined to assign him to duty, but detained him, waiting orders. His reasons for so doing were given in his letter to Commander Johnston, dated January 27, 1852, in which he stated, that Commander Johnston was not placed in command on joining the Pacific squadron, because there was no ship or station there at that time without a commander; he also stated, that he wished to keep in reserve a reliable commander to meet any emergency that might happen in the squadron; and that by remaining on shore, Commander Johnston would occupy a good position for apprehending deserters from the squadron, thus rendering desertions less liable to occur. Commander Johnston was thus detained on shore waiting orders under expenses, far exceeding his pay. The committee reported the bill to reimburse the expenses to which he had been put.

The bill was reported to the Senate, and was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time. It was subsequently read a third time, and passed.

EXPENSE OF SOUTH CAROLINA IN THE FLORIDA WAR.

Mr. DE SAUSSURE. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate to take up the bill to indemnify the State of South Carolina for money expended for the use of the United States in the war in Florida with the Seminole Indians. This bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and has been reported by that committee unanimously I believe. I do not think that any objection will be made to the bill, or that it will give rise to discussion. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to take it up now and put it upon its passage.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to require the Secretary of War to pay to the State of South Carolina such sums of money as were paid by that State in 1838, 1839, and 1840 for services, losses, and damages sustained by her volunteers in the Florida war of 1836, 1837, and 1838, while in the service of the United States, and on their return from that service, as were ascertained and allowed by a board of commissioners appointed for that purpose by an act of the Legislature of South Carolina in 1837.

The Committee on Military Affairs propose to amend the bill by adding the following proviso:

Provided, however, That no interest shall be allowed upon the moneys paid to the State of South Carolina under the provisions of this bill.

The amendment was agreed to, the bill was reported to the Senate as amended, the amendment was concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time. It was subsequently read a third time and passed.

IRA DAY.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill for the relief of Ira Day.

The PRESIDENT. The indorsement upon this bill is, that an amendment was made in Committee of the Whole, on the motion of the Senator from Virginia, striking out the provision for the allowance of interest. When the bill was reported to the Senate that amendment was disagreed to. The bill, therefore, stands as it was reported, and the question is on ordering it to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. HUNTER. I have already discussed this question, and I was willing to allow the bill to pass if it did not contain the provision in relation to interest. It seems to me that it is introducing a dangerous principle, and in some respects a new one; but I am not disposed now to renew that question. All I shall ask is, that we may have the yeas and nays upon the passage of the bill. I understand that the bill now provides for the payment of interest upon this debt. I shall, therefore, ask for the yeas and nays upon its passage.

Mr. BORLAND. I would like to hear the bill read.

It was accordingly read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c. That the Postmaster General is hereby authorized and required to pay to Ira Day, of Vermont, $1,008 90, together with the interest thereon, from the first day of July, 1837, out of the funds of the Post Office Department, in full for the balance due to him for transporting the mail from Rorallon to Burlington, in the State of Vermont, from January, 1833, to July, 1837.

Mr. BADGER. Mr. President, I am exceedingly sorry that the Senator from Virginia should find a great principle involved in this small appropriation, standing in the way of doing what is manifestly right and just. I am very sorry for it. The case, in a few words, is this: This man was a contractor to carry the mail. Mr. Barry, the Postmaster General, finding himself in want of funds, it being inconvenient for the Department to meet its engagements, issued an order suspending the running of the mails one day in seven, and struck out of the compensation one seventh portion of it without any authority—the contract between the Government and the contractor being, that if the Postmaster General should find the route to be an unproductive one, he should be at liberty to discontinue it altogether; and that was the only power reserved to him. He discontinued the running of the mail one day in seven, and withheld from the contractor one seventh portion of the money to which he was entitled. This contractor ran the mail during the whole time, as under his contract he had a right to do; as under his contract he was bound to do, unless he voluntarily surrendered the privilege; and, as he might just as well have done, for he was bound to keep up all his stock during that time, and they might as well have been running over the road as remaining idle in the stables. Such is the case.

My friend from Virginia said, in the first place, that he doubted whether this man was entitled to the principal, and was very certain he was not entitled to the interest. Why is he not entitled to interest? The withholding of this man's money from him was nothing better than rapine and plunder. It was not a case of debt, or a claim to be ascertained against the Government. Here was the money in the hands of the Postmaster General. It was the contractor's money. It was due to him under the contract. Without law, without excuse, without apology, the Postmaster General refused to pay it to him. He arbitrarily withheld it; and because he stood in an official station, he was beyond the reach of any process by which he could be compelled to pay. The Government therefore have withheld this man's money from that day to this. His money has been in the hands of the Government—money to which he was just as much entitled as he was to the money which he had in his own pocket. Yet we are told that it is doubtful whether he is entitled to the principal, and very certain that he is not entitled to the interest!

I agree, as a general rule, that claimants upon the Government ought not to be entitled to interest until they have produced and verified their claims, and proved them. But this claim needed no verification. Here was a violent outrage attempted to be committed by the head of the Post Office Department, in withholding money known to be due under the contract. That was the case. In using these terms, I do not mean to use them in a reproachful sense towards the particular individual who committed this act. He might have thought that the necessities of the Government justified him in doing it. But these are the facts nevertheless; and the character of the transaction cannot be altered.

Now, sir, as I think the principal was plainly due; as I think it was an extraordinary case—the Government having this man's money in its hands, and by the authority of its officer, without excuse, justification, or apology, refusing to pay it over to him—I cannot but believe that it is impossible to do justice without paying the party the interest as well as the principal.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I am sorry to say that I take a very different view of this subject from the honorable and distinguished Senator from North Carolina. I conceive that there was no outrage on the part of the Postmaster General in the exercise of the authority which he did exercise in reference to this contract; and though I am willing to concede that the question is one of doubt, yet it is by no means clear that the authority of the Postmaster General was not strictly and regularly exercised according to law, under the stipulations of the contract. I will endeavor to present the case as briefly as I can, in order to show that there was no outrage. I think I shall succeed at least in showing that if this is a case for compensation at all, it is questionable; and that it certainly is not a case for the allowance of interest.

This claim, in the first instance, came before Congress at the second session of the Twenty-fifth Congress, and then the committee were discharged from its further consideration. At the third session of the same Congress a bill was reported; but at the first session of the Twenty-sixth Congress the bill was laid on the table. At the first session of the Twenty-eighth Congress the committee were discharged from the consideration of the subject, and the bill for the relief of the party was indefinitely postponed. This shows at least that the opinion of the Senate then was adverse to the claim. The present view which is taken of the case, in favor of the claim, is founded on a report by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, made at this session of Congress on the same state of facts precisely that existed at the first session of the Twenty-eighth Congress, and on the same proof precisely, arriving at a different conclusion as to the legal construction of one of the terms of the contract existing between the Postmaster General and the petitioner.

The case is not now to be passed upon for the first time. A petition was presented to Congress based upon a similar clause in a contract—and a clause to which I will advert—for I have the contract here—under which the Postmaster General, anterior to this time, had universally, without hesitation, as a customary clause in these contracts, exercised the power to curtail under the general power to put an end to the contract. That clause was in these words:

"It is mutually understood by the contracting parties, that if the route, or any part of the route herein mentioned, shall be discontinued by act of Congress; or in the opinion of the Postmaster General becomes useless, or if a line of stages or steamboats shall be established on the whole, or any part of it, where the mail is not so carried under the contract; then this contract, or such part of it, shall cease to be binding on the Postmaster General, he giving notice of such event, and making allowance of one month's extra pay."

There is also another clause of the contract which gives a right to alter the route, and there is a clause reserving to the Postmaster General the right of annulling the contract in case the contractor does not promptly adopt the alteration required. These are the distinct clauses of the contract. These clauses had received a customary construction down to and subsequent to the year 1839. An application was made to Congress by a Mr. Caldwell upon a precisely similar clause in his contract, where the Postmaster General exercised the authority. Whatever motives may have influenced the Postmaster General in exercising the authority is not a question which affects the case. It was a power entirely within his own discretion. Nothing appears in the order as to the motives influencing him. The discretion confided to the Postmaster General was absolute, and the order given assigned no reasons for it. The terms of the order were, that the party should discontinue the contract in a certain mode. Power to curtail, under the general power to put an end to the contract, had been uniformly and constantly exercised as the true construction of that clause down to and subsequently even to the time when this contract was so curtailed. I admit that subsequently to that time doubts having arisen in the minds of some members of Congress, or of the head of the Post Office Department—the power having been questioned, there has been a new clause inserted into the Post Office contracts, which gives the express right to curtail. But anterior to that, the clause to which I have alluded was the customary clause in the contracts. It is certain that under that clause the Postmaster General had been in the habit, in all cases, without regard to parties, of exercising the right of curtailment under the general right to put an end to the contract. Upon the petition of Caldwell, Congress passed a bill for his relief, and made the measure of that relief to be dependent upon the legality of the exercise of this power on the part of the Postmaster General; that is to say, the question was to be referred to the Attorney General of the United States for his decision. It was so referred, and Mr. Legaré gave his written opinion, contrary to the opinion entertained by the honorable Senator from North Carolina, sustaining the power of the Postmaster General under this clause of the contract. I intend to read that opinion to the Senate, because I think it is entitled to great weight, and it will at least create a doubt in the minds of Senators quite sufficient to remove all idea of outrage on the part of the Postmaster General in the curtailment of this contract. It is to be found in the opinions of the Attorneys General, page 1562. It is in these words:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL. }
December 31, 1842. }

SIR: In the case of J. F. Caldwell, referred to me under the act of the last session, authorizing you to audit and settle his accounts for carrying certain mails, the Attorney General should be of opinion that the Postmaster General had not the right, under the contract with Caldwell, to make the alterations in the mode of transporting the mails, which were ordered by the Department. I have the honor to inform you that I have carefully considered the subject, and am very clear that the Postmaster General had a right, under section 10 of the contract, to make the change in question.

The right reserved to him, as between him and the contractor, was to discontinue the route if he deemed it useless. Suppose him to have been guilty of incapacity, or even malversation, in discontinuing the route, the head of the Department was responsible only to Congress and the country. All that the contractor had a right, in such a case, to demand of him, was notice of the event—that is, unquestionably—of his having determined to discontinue the route, and the allowance of one month's extra pay. Any claim for damages beyond that liquidated sum against the Government for carriages and horses purchased and left on his hands, would have been, in such a case, clearly unfounded. Like the creditor who has relied on a stipulated penalty, he gets his bond, and no more.

Now, what has the Department done in this case, and been in the habit of doing in all similar cases? It has partially discontinued the route; it has discontinued it for a third or half of the time, as the case may be; and the question is, whether authority to do the less is not implied in that to do the greater? Were it not even in invitum, I could scarcely doubt it was; but it is not so. The true interpretation of the contract, and the conduct of the parties, is, that it gave an option to the contractor, as soon as he received his notification that the Postmaster General considered himself as no longer bound to renounce it entirely on his part, and receive his month's pay in advance. Clearly he had a right to do so. If he preferred going on with the service on the new terms, he has nobody to blame but himself, if he be paid only for the services he has actually rendered the Government. Otherwise the case would stand thus: If the Postmaster General discontinued the route entirely, and gave no employment at all to the labor and capital prepared for performing the contract, the claimant would be compelled to acquiesce in this decision on receiving a reasonable pay; for the contract is express to that effect, and he has nothing to do with the question whether the discretion of the Postmaster General was properly exercised or not; all he might say in such a case would be damnum absque injuria. But because a new arrangement, providing for his employment to a very considerable extent, and so diminishing the loss or chances of loss he incurs, was offered him, he is entitled to full damages for all he suffered by incomplete performance of the original contract. Surely this were a solecism in law.

The construction of the contract which I have adopted, appears to me, independent of all practice or precedent, the sound and reasonable one; and I regret that I cannot concur in the view of this subject taken by the committee of the House in 1838. But I have no doubt that the uniform practice of the Department must be considered as implicitly entering into the contract and making a part of it. (Beers et al. vs. Houghton, 9 Pet., 339.) It is a universal principle and elementary rule of the law of contracts, that a contract is understood to contain the customary clauses, although they are not expressed; in contractibus tacite veniunt quæ sunt moris et consuetudinis.—(Evans's Pothier, §5.)

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,
H. S. LEGARÉ.

E. WHITTLESLEY, ESQ.,
Auditor of the Post Office Department.

Without meaning to go into the question of whether, were this a new question, it would be a matter of doubt; and without going into the question whether, in such a case, I should concur in the opinion so ably stated by Mr. Legaré, taking the fact stated by him, that this, as a customary clause in the contracts, had been invariably so acted upon by the Department, I hold its construction to be settled by that action—that the power to curtail was included in the power to abandon at the discretion of the Postmaster General. If that be so, the discontinuance can be no outrage. It may have been an error, if you will, on the part of the Postmaster General, but surely it cannot have been an outrage.

Subsequent to this opinion, Caldwell again applied to Congress for relief, and a bill was passed providing for his relief. But it presents this remarkable feature, that there was one adverse report upon the claim, which does not appear to be in writing, and then there was a favorable report, also not in writing; so that there is no means of knowing the reasons on which the allowance in that case was made, and the bill ultimately passed. But there is this great distinction between the case of Caldwell and the one now before the Senate: Caldwell protested at the time the contract was curtailed, against the power of the Postmaster General to do it. In this case the contractor assented to the exercise of the power. He discontinued the mail for three days, which showed that he assented; and, subsequent to that, because the surrounding inhabitants of the district and the postmasters there chose to ask him to renew the transportation of the mail on Sunday he did so. It must be remembered that the question was whether the Sunday mail should be abrogated. The inhabitants of the neighborhood found its suspension an inconvenience, and they prevailed upon the contractor to go on and carry the mail, notwithstanding the fact that he had stopped it in obedience to the order, and notwithstanding the fact that the postmaster at Royalton had certified to the Postmaster General, under date of the 3d

December, 1834, (the order having been given in the preceding November,) that the discontinuance of the Sunday mail to Burlington had taken effect. He went on voluntarily carrying this mail, and passengers, too, doubtless, on Sunday. He went on without giving any notice to the Department whatever—without making any claim upon the Department until his term had expired, nearly three years afterwards, in 1837. He then came forward and made a claim against the Government, although he had, as far as the Government could know—as far as the Postmaster General could know—as far as there was any evidence in the office, assented to the order. He went on upon the representation of these parties that he would be recompensed hereafter. But he never communicated to the Postmaster General—nor was there any communication to the Postmaster General—that the order had not been complied with during the whole period; nor was any claim made on the Department until the contract had entirely expired, in 1837—a period of nearly three years. Hence the cases are totally distinct.

This contractor made no protest. He assented to the right of the Postmaster General to make the order. He represents, however, in his petition, that he was induced to go on and carry the mail during the remainder of the term of the contract on Sundays, which the Postmaster General directed him not to do, by the wishes of the inhabitants of the neighborhood, and at the solicitation of the local postmasters, who told him that they had no doubt he would be compensated. But he took care not to communicate to the Department the fact that he had not obeyed the order, and was carrying the mail in defiance of the order, and expecting compensation for it. The two cases, therefore, are essentially different. In the case of Caldwell, he protested at the time; he objected to it at the time. This contractor did not do so. He went on quiescently, in the ignorance of the Postmaster General; and it was only after the contract expired, that he came forward to make any claim. I ask, then, whether in a case—a doubtful case if you will—as to the construction of a power, but which power had been universally exercised anterior to that time, where the propriety of the exercise of the power was sustained by the judgment of the then able Attorney General of the United States, we are to pay interest? This change was made, as it was made throughout the country, on public grounds; the party assented to it; he made no objection to it; a certificate was given by the postmaster at Royalton that the party had discontinued; and the papers show that he stopped the mail for two or three days, but afterwards resumed it, without communicating with the Department, at the mere solicitation of the surrounding neighborhood, so putting the mere will of the local population against the express order of the officer of the Government, who was entitled to give his order in reference to the subject-matter. I ask, then, whether this is a case for compensation at all, much less a case for the allowance of interest?

I did not intend to have touched upon the question of compensation in this case, (the amount not being great,) had the interest not been restored to the bill. But it seems to me that it is assuming very bold ground indeed, to tell us, in the face of the opinion which I have read, that this is a case of plain outrage—that the Government has retained in the Department a liquidated sum due the party without cause, or without any power whatever; and that we are therefore bound to pay interest. I am not willing to concede this; I cannot agree with the Senator from North Carolina. If the Senate determine, contrary to the opinion of Mr. Legaré, that this is a case in which the Postmaster General exercised a doubtful power, or even exceeded his power, still, if it is a case of mere doubt, it is clear that it is not a case for the allowance of interest. It must be recollected that the party went on; he acquiesced in the order, as far as he made any communication to the Department; he made no subsequent application till his contract had expired; he went on and received his money according to the order for curtailed service down to 1837. But, after 1837, he came forward, and on the representation of the postmaster at Royalton, and other citizens of the neighborhood, he asked the Postmaster General to compensate him for running the mail on Sunday, contrary to order. The Postmaster General declined doing so, on the ground that the party was not entitled to it; because the order had directed a discontinuance; and he had discontinued in obedience to the order, and subsequently revived it without any authority at all.

Supposing, then, that the right to discontinue were even doubtful, is it a case in which interest ought to be allowed? I do not mean now to go into a discussion of the question of interest at large. Perhaps at some future day, and on some other occasion, I shall endeavor to sustain the general view which I entertain on the subject of the payment of interest by the Government—which is, that in no case, except the case of a special agreement to pay interest, will my vote ever be given for the payment of interest on a claim against the United States. I know no principle that could sustain it. It is contrary to the doctrine and practice of all other Governments, as well as our own. On the question of interest, I beg leave to refer to two opinions of the same able officer from whom I have already quoted. They are not very long, and one of them is very important in its statement of the principles on which interest is to be granted. One is to be found on page 1478, of the same volume of Opinions of the Attorneys General, from which I shall only read one extract, in which he merely states the principle and the practice. He says:

"There may be cases in which I might think the head of a Department authorized to allow interest, but they would be rare and singular exceptions. What feature is there in this case which is not to be found in every case of delay, not caused by the claimant himself in settling an account? If a mistake of law on the part of an accounting officer, leading to the rejection of an item, renders the Government liable to pay interest on a reconsideration of the case, why should not any other mistake or laches of its officers have the same effect?"

"But nothing is better established, as a general rule, than that the Government is not to pay damages in such cases: a stern but necessary rule adopted everywhere in the practice of Government."

The other opinion to which I refer, is to be found on pages 1559 and 1560 of the same volume, which is somewhat more extended, and goes somewhat more into the subject. This opinion was given on the case of Cogswell. Mr. Legaré says:

"The state of the case is, that, in passing Mr. Cogswell's accounts, allowances were refused him which ought to have been made, from a mistaken view of the law on the part of the executive officers."

"It is admitted that the Government ought not, in general, to pay interest in the absence of special contract to that effect. It is admitted that this is a stern but necessary rule, and applies to the vast majority of cases, notwithstanding the equitable principle that interest is an incident to the debt. Then, why should the Government be subjected to the payment of interest in a case in which its delay to pay the principal was owing to a bona fide conviction on the part of its officers that it was not due? Such a mistake rather fortifies the case of the Government; for interest is due, not only because the money of one man is in the hands of another when payment of it might have been demanded, but because that other is presumed to have made, or ought, in common prudence, to have made advantage by it."

"Now, if he thought it his own, and had good reason to think so, it is evident he was not bound, as trustee for another, to turn it to account for his profit. Accordingly, though in general an executor is bound, after a reasonable delay, to pay interest on all sums received by him, yet he is not charged with interest for a balance in his hands retained under a fair misapprehension of his right.—(12 Vesey, 386—Brewer vs. Penberton. See Lord Eldon's reasoning in that case.)"

"If, therefore, mere delay to pay money due, and even delay from laches of its agents, does not render the Government liable to pay interest, much less ought it to be made liable by a fair misapprehension of its rights on the part of these agents. There can be no doubt that the well-established equitable principle between man and man is, in general, the other way. The exception in favor of the Government has been established by the policy of society, and for the protection of the public, which, besides being exposed to imposition, is no man's negotiorum gestor."

"I am bound to adhere to the course of the Executive Department, until Congress shall see fit to change it."

I submit that the principle here stated is sound; and that any attempt to apply the doctrine of the allowance of interest, as obtaining between individuals, to the relation existing between the citizen and the Government, or the subject and the Government, will only lead to extreme error. No gentleman who discusses the question ever denies the general principle, as a necessary rule, that interest is not allowable against a Government, except in cases of special contract to that effect. If you are to avoid the rule in exceptional cases, you ought, at least, to have some stronger case than the one now before you. It would be a dangerous discretion to exercise at best, for a moment to depart from that rule. What rule are you to abide by? Is it private compassion for the individual? Is it personal partiality to the individual? Or are political considerations to creep, as they sometimes may, into these matters? If we are to abandon the general rule of the Government, and say we will pay interest on a claim, not founded upon any general principle of policy, but founded upon the particular circumstances of the case, which may be decided according to the mere caprice—yes, I may say caprice—of the individual members who may happen to compose a majority of the members of the Senate and the House at the time the claim is presented, where will it lead us? I submit, that in all governmental action, general rules, especially in matters of this kind, must be adhered to, or the inevitable result will be corruption in its worst sense.

Now, sir, as to the particular case which is before the Senate, it stands thus: The best case that can be made out for the argument on the other side is, that there was a misapprehension in the construction of a law on the part of the Postmaster General; a construction which had been acted upon for years before, under similar contracts; which had never been questioned before; which was sustained subsequently by the opinion of the law officer of the Government, and which, certainly, no Senator, after reading that opinion, can tell me is not a matter of doubt. The Postmaster General exercised the authority on public considerations for the benefit of the country, not in reference to this individual, but in reference to others, also; and shall I be told that this is a case of outrage; that this is a case of withholding a man's money; a plain, naked case of wrong, and that, therefore, you are to make it an exceptional case, and allow interest? It seems to me that if you allow interest in this case, there is no one case in which you can possibly refuse it. The party assented, without objection, to the exercise of this power by the Postmaster General. He withdrew the Sunday mail for some days; afterwards he resumed it, not on notice to the Department; not by subsequent agreement with the Department; not with the knowledge of the Department, but on the mere will and desire of the inhabitants of the local neighborhood in which he resided, and of the postmasters there. Without any communication to the Department, he carried this mail contrary to its order; and at a period three years subsequently, when the contract itself expired, he came forward with this claim against the Government. This, then, in my judgment, is no case for the allowance of interest; and it is even doubtful whether the principal ought to be paid.

Mr. RUSK. I do not think that I have seen a single claim preferred against the Government of the United States, with the justice of which I have been more struck than in the present case. About the facts we do not disagree. A contract was entered into for the transportation of the daily mail over a certain route; the individual who prefers this claim took that contract, and commenced the transportation of the mail daily; without any authority given by the contract for that purpose, the Postmaster General discontinued the running of the mail on one day in the week. Now, how does the case present itself? Here is a clear violation of the contract by one of the parties—the one holding the power.

Mr. BAYARD. Was there no reservation in the contract?

Mr. RUSK. No, sir; there was no reservation. Here is a clear violation of the contract by the person holding the power; and that, after the contract had been going on for some time! The contractor carrying the mail must have a certain number of coaches, and a certain number of horses for the purpose of executing his contract. He must incur a large expense in this way, and then, after doing so, in full compliance with his contract, the Postmaster General sees fit to stop one seventh of the service. But the expense to the contractor continues to be the same; he cannot withdraw his teams, or his coaches from the route, because he would, by so doing, render himself incapable of carrying the mail on the other six days of the week. He is ordered to stop; to rest on his oars. To do this in an ordinary contract between individuals, there should be some provision contained in the contract itself to render such an act valid; and I conceive that the Government ought to be bound by the same principles which would be binding on individuals. arbitrary exercise of power by the Postmaster General, then, as I view it, is a clear violation of the contract.

It is said that the contract reserved the right to the Postmaster General to discontinue it at his discretion altogether; that is true, but there is a penalty, or a consideration for the discontinuance of the contract; and that is one month's extra pay to the contractor. But the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] proceeded to argue that the greater power includes the lesser, and he read an opinion of the Attorney General, for the time being, as his authority. But that very opinion admits at once all that I hold. I have not read that opinion myself, but I paid attention to it as read by the Senator, and I find that it assumes that the greater power includes the lesser, and that when the contract was discontinued for one day, by the Postmaster General, the contractor should have thrown up his contract, and should have demanded his month's pay. That is an admission of the whole case in a single moment. It seems to me that it must strike the mind of every Senator in that way, and if so, there is no necessity for arguing the question any further.

Now, I doubt whether the authority to terminate the entire contract and give the month's extra pay, was in the power of the Postmaster General. If, however, the contract was annulled, the contractor became entitled to it. The power to discontinue altogether is very different from the power to discontinue in part; because if he discontinues altogether, the contractor can take off his teams and carriages and put them somewhere else. But if the service is discontinued but one day in the week, he must keep all his teams and carriages, and be at an enormous expense, precisely the same as if he performed the whole service. Is there anything just, is there anything fair, or proper in this? Clearly not, in my opinion. The service which the contractor agreed to perform was performed; the payment which the Government agreed to give for that service was withheld by the Postmaster General. The service was all performed with the exception of three days, and the pay which the Postmaster General had contracted to give for that service, has been withheld to this day. It seems to me that there can be no question that this claim ought to be paid. The facts are so plain that I do not see the necessity for looking into the legal opinions of Attorneys General, for the purpose of getting an abstract metaphysical opinion to answer the question. The contract was made for so much service; the Government had the service and ought to pay the money. And if the Government has withheld the money which ought to have been paid, ought not Government to pay the interest for that money? I think it ought. These men were poor, and had to expend money to complete the contract eight or ten years ago; and almost ever since that time they have been asking Congress to pay them for the service which they performed. It is not through their fault or laches that they have not received it, but it is entirely owing to the laches and inattention on the part of the Congress of the United States.

The Senator from Delaware has referred to some action which has been had upon this subject in the Senate. I know that once or twice this question has been argued, upon the supposition that the authority to curtail the service was included in the contract; and not until the last report was the fact made known that it was not included in the contract.

Mr. BAYARD. Such was the universal assertion. But I would like to know whether the uniform construction of the contract, incidentally, had not been, that the power to discontinue included the power to curtail?

Mr. RUSK. I consider that it has not, upon anything that transpired incidentally, and taking it for granted that the contract was similar to those now entered into. In the contracts which have been entered into for a number of years past, the authority to curtail service is vested in the Postmaster General, and a provision to that effect is inserted in the contract in plain terms. It is not to be found in a sort of reasoning, that the larger power includes the less. Then this is a clear case of the violation of a contract on the part of the Postmaster General. There is sufficient evidence of the performance of all the service which the contractor engaged to perform, and the question is, will you pay the contractor for the service rendered? Had you, as an individual, employed me to perform a similar service, would you evade the payment, if possible, in this manner? No; you would not do it. Then if the principles of equity and justice, as between man and man, would require the payment for this service, how is the obligation lessened when the transaction is between an individual and the Government?

Mr. UPHAM. I am exceedingly sorry, Mr. President, to perceive that so small a claim as this should meet with such strenuous opposition, while claims of much greater magnitude, although less obvious as to their justice and equity, are passed upon and allowed here almost every day.

Although this question has been pending for a great number of years, it seems to me that now, for the first time, the question is raised as to whether there is any foundation for the original claim; and it is questioned whether the contractor has any just or equitable, or legal right to claim compensation for the rendition of these services.

In the first place, as I before remarked, this question has been pending for a long time; but it has always met with the favorable regard of the committee to which it has been referred, and a bill for the payment of the amount, once passed the Senate. It first came here in an equitable point of view—on principles of equity and justice; and, the matter being regarded in that light, a bill was passed by the Senate some three or four years ago. The other question—that is, the legal question which is presented in this case—has come up for the first time during the present session, and for the reason that it was supposed that the old mail contracts, according to the form of which this contract was made, were like those now made. In looking into this contract, however, I find that a power has been exercised by the Postmaster General which was not provided for in the contract, and which, it is believed, did not legally exist—in other words, that the only power which the Postmaster General had over the contract is reserved and specified in the contract itself. It therefore stands upon precisely the same footing as all other contracts made between individuals. A contract between the Government and an individual, or a number of individuals, unquestionably stands upon the same ground as a contract between two individuals. The terms of the agreement are reduced to writing, and both parties are bound by it. In this case, as in all others, it took two to make a contract; and, having the assent of both parties, as a matter of course it should take two to rescind it. Here was a contract entered into to transport a daily mail on the route from Boston to Lake Champlain—which route was continued from Lake Champlain to Montreal. A daily mail had long been carried on that route, and a contract was entered into with the parties claimant to continue it. The contract being entered into, the contractor furnished all the requisite stock for its proper fulfillment—as horses, coaches, harness, and so forth, and hired the necessary drivers. This party had his contract by authority, and what is there in that contract which authorizes the Postmaster General to interfere?

The contract provides, in the first place, that if Congress shall discontinue the route for which the contract is made, then the contract shall cease. It will be perceived that it is for Congress to make post routes. The Postmaster General cannot do it. Congress declare what routes shall be post routes; and when Congress have made them such, the Postmaster General contracts for the services to be performed upon them. Here, then, was a post route established by Congress; “and now,” says the Postmaster General to the contractor, “if Congress should pass any act discontinuing this route as a mail route, I shall have no authority to transport the mail over it, and therefore the contract will cease to be binding on me.” It further provides—Congress not being always in session—that if the Postmaster General should come to the conclusion that the route is useless—mind you, not that it does not require the amount of service to be performed upon it which has been agreed for—but if he should come to the conclusion that it was useless, or if he should discontinue any portion of it—as Congress could do—then the contract for the whole, or such part so discontinued, should cease to be binding upon the Postmaster General. Thus, then, as I have remarked, Congress not being in session, if, in the opinion of the Postmaster General, a route should become useless, so that it is unnecessary to transport any mail over it daily or otherwise, then the contract ceases in regard to the whole. If, likewise, it is only a portion of a route that ceases, then the contract ceases in regard to that portion. This power is vested in Congress, and the Postmaster General may do the same thing if a route, or any portion of it, should become useless. But, sir, while a route continues a mail route, the Postmaster General having contracted for a certain amount of service upon it, has no authority to reduce that service without the consent of the contracting party. The contract gives him no such authority. It is only when it ceases to be a mail route that the contract can cease before it expires by its own limitation. These contractors, therefore, had no hazard to run. They knew that the route between Boston and Lake Champlain would never become useless, that it never would be discontinued; that it had been a mail route for years, and, for anything they could see to the contrary, might continue to remain a mail route for all coming time. All this was well enough understood.

Here is the provision, then, in the contract in regard to discontinuing a route; and this is all the power the Postmaster General has in this respect:

“It is mutually understood by the contracting parties, that if the route, or any part of the route, herein mentioned, shall be discontinued by act of Congress, or, in the opinion of the Postmaster General, becomes useless, or if a line of stages or steamboats shall be established on the whole or any part of it, where the mail is not so carried under the contract, then this contract, or such part of it shall cease to be binding on the Postmaster General, he giving notice of such event, and making allowance of one month's extra pay.”

Now, it is under this clause, and this clause alone, that the Postmaster General claimed the right to exercise the power which he exercised in this case. That is the clause that was given to me at the Post Office Department when I called. The gentleman from Delaware has read another clause:

“And it is also agreed that the Postmaster General may alter the time of arrival and departure fixed by said schedule, and alter the routes, (he making an adequate compensation for any extra expense which may be occasioned thereby,) and the Postmaster General reserves the right of annulling this contract in case the contractor does not promptly adopt the alteration required.”

Now, there have been no alterations made here; the contract has not been altered or annulled; the clause, therefore, which I last read, has no application to the question under consideration. The question is simply a legal one—whether the Postmaster General had a right, under this contract, to make the alteration.

I stated, Mr. President, that this contract was made in the days of Mr. Barry. The honorable Senator from Delaware says that it has been the uniform practice of the Government, under contracts similar to this, to curtail the service. With great respect for the Senator from Delaware, I beg to say that he is mistaken. Mr. Barry, I am informed, was the first Postmaster General who ever attempted to exercise that power, and he exercised it in consequence of the embarrassed condition of the Department at the time.

After the opinion of the Attorney General, which has been referred to, and the action of Congress, a new form of contract was adopted. The Senate from Delaware, however, contends that the Postmaster General had the same power under the old form of contract as he now has under the new form. This is the present form in regard to this matter:

"It is hereby stipulated and agreed, by the said contractor and his sureties, that the Postmaster General may alter the contract, and alter the schedule, he allowing a pro rata increase of compensation within the restrictions imposed by law for the additional service required, or for the increased speed, if the employment of additional stock or carriers is rendered necessary; but the contractor may, in case of increased expedition, relinquish the contract on timely notice, if he prefer it to the change; also, that the Postmaster General may discontinue or curtail the service, in order to place on the route a greater degree of service, or whenever the public interests require such discontinuance or curtailment for any other cause, he allowing one month's extra pay on the amount of service dispensed with."

I should like to know, Mr. President, why the form of contract was altered, if the power to reduce the amount of service on a post route, after a contract had been made, existed under the old form? Why adopt a new form, and in express words confer that power upon the Postmaster General, if he was vested with the power before? There was no reason for it but one, and that was, that he had not the power without that alteration of the prescribed form; and having exercised the power, Congress decided that he had no right to exercise it under the old form, and, therefore, they made a new one. But, says the gentleman from Delaware, the opinion of the Attorney General, who is the highest law officer of the Government, settled the question. The Attorney General, I admit, drew up the opinion, which has been read by the Senator from Delaware. I have no disposition to criticize that opinion; but I cannot avoid thinking that the Attorney General drew it up without much consideration, or a very nice regard to the facts of the case; and I am led to this conclusion from the fact, that he seems to have made no distinction between the power of entirely doing away with a route, or a part of a route, and the service to be performed upon it. I contend, however, that there is a wide distinction between the two cases, and that therefore his opinion has no real application to this case. A report had been made in Congress in 1838, setting forth the proceedings in the case of Caldwell, and concluding that the Postmaster General had no authority whatever to make a reduction in the service. The question came up in the House, and the decision of the Postmaster General was overruled; and, after the question came to the Senate, the opinion of the House of Representatives was unanimously sustained. I therefore contend, that this opinion has no binding force whatever. The House overruled it, and the Senate did not even enter into an argument upon it. They established the report made in 1838. There is not a solitary case on record where the service has been reduced in this way, and where a claim made for that reduction has not been paid. Sir, in one case this session, we paid a man in the State of Maine, some $13,000.

But it is contended that in this case the contractor went on without giving any notice to the Department; that the Department did not know that their order had not been obeyed until the term of the contract had expired. Sir, that was a contract which could not have been thus fully carried out without the knowledge and the tacit consent of the Department.

But the gentleman from Delaware alleges that the contractor assented to this order. How did he assent to it? Did he omit his Sunday's trip? No, sir; he ran every day, as was his custom. And why was the mail given to him to carry every day in the week if the Government had no knowledge that he was running the full trips and performing the full amount of service contracted for? The postmaster at Royalton certified in his monthly returns that the Sunday mail had been carried as usual. Nor is it shown that a single trip was omitted—not one. The people on the road protested against this discontinuance of the Sunday mail, because it caused an actual delay of thirty-six hours on one of the greatest thoroughfares in the State of Vermont, and therefore they insisted that it should be carried; and the postmaster delivered to the contractor the mail every day in the week, well knowing, as he must have done, that the order to discontinue one day was not obeyed. How, then, under these circumstances, can gentlemen show that the contractor acquiesced in the order? If the Government did not know that he was running the mail every day in the week, how came he by the mail? How came the postmaster there to deliver him the mail if it was not to be transported?

Everything goes to show that the Department knew that the mail was run every day in the week, although that is not inserted in the report. We have also the testimony of the drivers that the mail was transported during the whole time—that is, on every day without the intermission as ordered; and still the Senator from Delaware affirms that there was an acquiescence on the part of the contractor—in short, that he gave up carrying the mail on that day, and consented to the order. Sir, it is very strange that he should have consented to this reduction of the service and still have performed it! And when the contract expired, he called for his pay; but the money was withheld, on the ground that there was an order given, although it was well known that the mail was transported every day in the week! Sir, as I before remarked, if it was not understood, how came the contractor by the mail? Why was it not laid over on the Sunday? Again, I hold that the contractors had a right to stand upon their contract; and after the service has been performed, I think the objections which have been urged here come altogether too late. In the case of Caldwell, he did not transport the mail for three days in the week, and yet they paid him the whole sum. Why? Because the Postmaster General contracted to pay that sum, notwithstanding the decision of the Attorney General made in this same case. So also the decision in the case of Dwinell, and in every other where the pay has been withheld. In every single instance compensation has been made agreeably to the terms of the contract.

I ask, then, Mr. President, on what principle this claim is to be resisted, when all the others were paid when this decision was freshly made? On what ground can it be resisted, when it is admitted that the construction which has been put upon the old form of contracts was not sound, as is proved by the fact of their being subsequently altered, and the power conferred? On what principle of justice or equity can this claim be resisted? The mail was transported; the people were accommodated, and when the contract was out, they were still requested to carry it longer, and they did so for six months after the expiration of the contract. Congress passed a law authorizing the Postmaster General to extend the contract until the first of July. This claimant carried the mail till that time, and yet one seventh of the pay was retained. If the money was due, why should he not receive it? and if the Government have wrongfully retained it, why should they not pay interest? This amount is only what Government contracted to pay. When it became due, they did not pay it; and now the contractor only asks that the sum which has been thus wrongfully withheld should be paid to him, with the interest due thereon. I must confess I see no ground, either in justice or in equity, why it should not be paid.

The Post Office Department at the time was embarrassed; but they knew quite well that all this time the mail was regularly transported according to contract; they knew that the business of the country demanded it; and now, forsooth, they say that he is not entitled to anything—not even to the original one seventh which the Government agreed to pay him. Now, sir, let me conclude by saying that the Senate has settled this question once or twice before; and when the bill was last under consideration by the Senate, they refused to strike the interest out. Sir, I have not heard a voice speak against the justice of the original claim, and yet, rather than pay the interest which is justly due, it is sought to resist the whole claim. I submit to the Senate that justice, equity, every upright consideration, requires that this claim, with the interest, should be forthwith liquidated.

Mr. BAYARD. I rise simply to say as regards the question of right—the legal right to the claim—being now contested for the first time, that it is extraordinary to me that such an allegation should be made, when at a previous session of the Congress of the United States, a bill providing for the payment of this claim was indefinitely postponed, and when, in violation of the rules which are followed here, the bill was sent back to the committee without any additional testimony having been obtained, and was afterwards reported back favorably to the Senate. The claim was considered sufficiently indefinite to induce the Senate to postpone it indefinitely, and yet I am told by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. UPHAM,] that the claim is now contested for the first time, although, as I have shown, it has been brought forward here through a violation of the rules! In regard to myself, I should not have touched the question of interest if it had not been reinstated by a vote of the Senate, contrary to the vote cast when the bill had been previously before it as in Committee of the Whole. For that reason I find it necessary to oppose the bill. I would not have opposed it, however, if the Senate had been willing that it should pass; but when I am told, on this floor, that the Postmaster General exercised the power according to usage—usage which continued subsequent to that time, as I am informed by the Department—usage which was strictly in accordance with the opinion of the law officer of the Government, one of the most able and distinguished men that ever filled that office, then, I say, that if, under such circumstances, you allow the interest demanded, because the claimant asserts that an outrage on his rights was committed, there is no case in which you can refuse the payment of interest.

I must confess that, in regard to this question, I am more opposed to the payment of the interest than to the payment of the principal; but the interest being included, I feel compelled to vote against the bill in toto. I believe that it is founded on an erroneous principle, and that the Postmaster General was authorized to exercise the power he used.

The information I possess, that there is a large class of persons, and a large class of cases depending on the action of the Senate in regard to this bill, and only awaiting its passage to make similar demands amounting in the aggregate to a large sum, constitutes another reason why I shall oppose it, as I cannot understand how they can be refused if the Senate should give its assent to the principle.

I know that it is always a thankless and unpleasant task to oppose private measures; it is an unpleasant duty to perform; but I do not come here to act on such measures in accordance with the dictates of my feelings. I look on the duty as being judicial, rather than legislative, in its character; and I endeavor, as far as my judgment will permit, to decide on a private claim, as a case between A and B would be decided according to certain recognized rules of law. I know of no principles of equity that can induce us to depart from this principle.

Mr. HALE. I do not wish to occupy the time of the Senate; but as I am acquainted with the contractor in this case, and know something of the merits of the question, I feel a degree of sympathy as well as a desire to see justice done. It seems to me that the Senate will not entertain all the nice questions which have been so ably argued by the honorable Senators from North Carolina [Mr. BAYARD] and from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] as to the legal rights of the party who performed the service, and the legal right of the Postmaster General to discontinue the service; because the service was actually rendered. And if the United States were in a situation to be sued, and the old action of common law of quantum meruit was brought, by which the party urges that for so much service rendered he must have so much, he would be entitled to recover, and the jury would be obliged to give a verdict in his favor to the extent of the service rendered, or in proportion to the time, which is one seventh. I know that an old rule laid down by a chief justice where I practiced law, was this: that where a party has a legal right to recover money, he has also a right to the interest from the time the demand is first made, up to the time of the rendering of the verdict. These are the plain honest principles which should be applied in this case. The service has been rendered, and the Government has received the value of money which it has retained. Let me illustrate it in the way in which it was once illustrated upon me, when I was arguing a case before a very respectable magistrate and a very sensible man, in behalf of a man who was sued for a fine for the non-performance of military service. I had raised a dozen nice points in the case, and argued it much in the same manner that the Senator from Delaware has argued the case before us, and I did it at very great length. When I was through, the judge looked me in the face and said: "Squire, 'pears to me your man did n't train, and 'pears to me he ought to pay a fine." Now that was so plain that I could not say another word. So I think that in this case the judge would say, "Seems to me the man carried the mail for you, and seems to me you ought to pay him for it." That is all I have to say.

Mr. MALLORY. I desire to say a single word on this subject, because I feel a peculiar interest in it, from the fact that the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent, has some claims pending which will be affected by the decision of the Senate.

We are constantly in the habit, on every Friday, of adjudicating on private claims, taking into consideration equitable principles alone. In this particular case, the fact that the committee has decided that the sum was due to the claimant some time since, is the starting point, and may be considered as fixing the fact beyond question. That being established, the United States are bound to pay the sum of money due to this individual; but they are not only bound to pay the money thus retained, but also for the loss caused by such detention. The United States cannot evade the obligation of paying interest on money, any more than it is possible for an individual to do so. And why? Because it is on that principle that the United States have proceeded in all their transactions, as between nation and nation; in every treaty or negotiation with foreign powers where money has been due to the United States, interest has been exacted. Now, if the United States did, in this case, as the committee asserts, withhold the amount due to this individual, he is as certainly entitled to payment on the same principles of justice which have induced this Government to exact it from other nations; for it is quite impossible that we can have one rule applicable to nations, and another as applicable to individuals.

One of the strongest points as to the exaction of interest upon demands not liquidated, but which are equitably due, arises under the treaty of Ghent. It will be recollected that the British carried off a vast amount of property, some of which consisted of slaves. Under the arbitrament of the Emperor of Russia it was decided that they should pay for the property thus taken. The United States demanded interest, and the question was: if they paid for the property, they should pay for its use. Passing over this, and coming down to the present day, it is well known that we have exacted interest from our sister Republic of Mexico. Why, then, is this interest refused? On what pretense is it refused, after you have agreed to pay the principal? It is opposed on the ground that the Government is always ready to pay a just demand. That being the philosophy, when the facts do not support it, the philosophy must fail.

I would say here, that scarcely a session passes in which interest is not adjudicated upon and allowed by special act of Congress. Having no doubt, Mr. President, that the report of the committee which carefully examined this question, is just, and that the sum in controversy was properly due to the claimant, I cannot see any reason why we should refuse to pay the interest; but, on the contrary, everything in the history of the adjudication of the country, in my opinion, compels us to pay it.

Mr. BRADBURY. I move to amend the bill by striking out the date "1837," and inserting the date "1852." It is not now in order to move that the clause providing for the payment of interest be stricken out, and therefore, for the purpose of reaching that object, so far as it may be done within our rules, I have offered this amendment. The effect of the amendment, if adopted, will be to provide for the payment of interest after the year 1852, instead of the year 1837. The remarks of the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] show that this case is regarded as one of very considerable importance in settling the principle whether we will pay interest on any unliquidated claims against the Government. He has told us that his State, or the citizens of his State, are largely interested in the decision of that question. The citizens of other States are similarly situated. Now, it becomes a very important question—upon which the payment of, not a few hundred, or a few thousand dollars, but of millions, may depend—whether Government will or will not pay the interest on claims which are presented. The honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. UPHAM] inquired, with very great pertinency, why this demand should be rejected when other demands of a similar character are paid? I think this case should be put upon precisely the same ground as other demands of a similar character. But I wish to remind the Senate that a case of a similar character was before us in the early part of the session, that of Rufus Dwinell, and at that time the question of the payment of interest was raised, and the provision for its payment was struck out from the bill. The question now is, whether we will conform to that precedent, or whether we will depart from it, and provide another, and make a rule which will be regarded as a precedent, as we are now informed, for similar applications.

Mr. BADGER. I do not rise to say anything upon this subject, but simply to remark that I could with great ease refute everything that the Senator from Maine has said. There is nothing in his remarks which may not be easily refuted, and I wish the Senate, therefore, to consider them as refuted.

Mr. BRADBURY. That is easier said than done.

Mr. RUSK. I rise to express my solemn protest against the course of reasoning pursued by the Senator from Maine. He does not say one word about the justice of allowing the interest on this claim, but we are to be frightened off by the fact that we are about to establish a precedent by which we are to pay Florida a large amount of money. Is that fair? It is a sort of reasoning against which I protest. I ask the Senate to consider the question of the justice of this claim; and if it is a just claim, to pay it; and when any claim on the part of Florida or Maine, or any other State, comes up, if it is a just one I shall vote for it. The history of the Government shows that we do not in all cases follow precedents. When a claim comes up on which we are bound to pay interest, we pay it; and when we are not, we refuse it.

Mr. BRADBURY. In the remarks which I made I wished to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that a claim involving precisely the same principle had been reported on, and that the question of interest had been fully discussed and negatived at the beginning of the session.

Mr. RUSK. Will the Senator from Maine permit me to interrupt him? I reported both these cases myself, and feel confident that there is no similarity, as he alleges. In the case alluded to by the Senator, the contractor had agreed that his service might be curtailed; in this case there was no such agreement. The cases are not the same.

Mr. BRADBURY. They involve the same principle. In the one case the individual came forward and agreed to discontinue on receiving an assurance that he should be paid; and the question for the consideration of the Senate was, whether he should receive interest after having presented and made proof of his claim to Congress. The subject was then fully discussed, and the question was settled as, in its opinion, it ought to be settled. I was disposed to acquiesce in that decision, and I referred to it simply as a case in which I had no feeling. In this case I am of opinion that the claim should be allowed; but if interest is paid in the one case it should be paid in the other.

Mr. RUSK. I would ask the Senator whether the State of Maine has not been paid interest on money which it advanced for military purposes?

Mr. BRADBURY. Maine has been treated precisely in the same manner as fourteen other States; but she has not, as yet, been paid interest.

In the reference I have made, I alluded to a principle which I supposed the Senate had established; and I have not gone into the question at length, because I did not desire to argue it, but merely to recall the fact to the recollection of Senators. If the Senate sees fit to pay interest in the present case, let it provide for its payment in other cases also, and I shall be satisfied with that decision.

It is an invidious act, I know, to resist private claims, but I consider it exceedingly important that we should act with uniformity, and with something like consistency of principle. That was my object in making these remarks.

Mr. MALLORY. I will make one remark in reply to the Senator from Maine. He has spoken of the establishment of a principle, and that principle, if I understand it, is, that the United States will not pay interest.

Mr. BRADBURY. On unliquidated demands against the Government.

Mr. MALLORY. That is not a principle, but a practice. No legislation has ever been had by which any such principle has been established; but so far as legislation has gone it has been to establish one directly the contrary. I hold in my hand a list of cases, which the Senator from Maine may examine if he chooses, in which the United States have departed from this alleged principle, and have paid interest. Now, this is the principle established by the legislation of the country, that where a sum of money is proved to be due—not legally, but equitably—there we pay interest, and that principle has been followed in nearly every session of Congress by practical legislation.

The case of Florida, to which I alluded, is involved in this principle; but still, the cases are exceedingly dissimilar, because the legality and the equity of the case of Florida is guaranteed by treaty stipulations, and there is no rule that can go behind them, while this case is simply based upon the report of a committee.

Mr. BORLAND. Before the vote is taken, I desire to state the ground on which I shall vote for this bill. I do not think there is any legal claim on the part of this individual against the Government, or that he has any claim on the ground of this contract; but I do think, as he rendered the service, and the service was valuable, that we ought to pay him for it. On equitable grounds, then, I would say, we should pay him, but not on the principle that there is any legal obligation to pay by the operation of that contract. I think some want of discrimination has been manifested in the discussion here upon this question, growing out of the use of the term "route." All are well aware that mail routes are established by act of Congress. The Postmaster General has nothing to do with the continuance or discontinuance of mail routes. But after they have been established by Congress, then it is at the discretion of the Postmaster General to contract for service upon them, and to modify that service, or discontinue it, if it becomes improper or useless. The continuance of the route, therefore, does not make the contract for service binding upon the Postmaster General to pay this amount. The Postmaster General discontinued the service, and not the route, and therefore he released himself and the Government from all legal obligation to pay the full amount of compensation agreed upon, and left no more obligation on himself or the Government than to pay pro rata for the service rendered. That is my view of the legal question. But, as I said, the individual did render the service; the postmaster continued to deliver and receive the mail, according to the original contract. The Government received the benefit of his services, and therefore the individual ought to be paid, as I am unwilling that the Government shall receive a valuable consideration without paying for it.

The amendment was rejected, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading—yeas, 29, nays 7.

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Badger, Borland, Brooke, Charlton, Clarke, Davis, De Saussure, Dodge of Wisconsin, Foot, Geyer, Gwin, Hale, James, Jones of Iowa, Mallory, Mangum, Morton, Norris, Rusk, Smith, Soule, Spruance, Sumner, Upham, Wade, Walker, and Weller—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bradbury, Dawson, Dodge of Iowa, Hunter, King, and Toney—7.

JOHN WILLIAMS.

On motion by Mr. JAMES, the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill for the relief of John Williams. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of John Williams, late a marine in the service of the United States, upon the list of pensioners, and pay him a pension for entire disability—the pension to commence April 5, 1848, and continue during his life.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

JAMES C. WATSON.

Mr. DAWSON. I desire to request my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, who reported House bill for the relief of the legal representatives of James C. Watson, of Georgia, to move to take it up for consideration.

Mr. ATCHISON. At the request of the Senator from Georgia, I move to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of taking up that bill.

Mr. BADGER. I wish one of the gentlemen would inform us, before we agree to the motion, whether there is any interest included in that bill.

Mr. DAWSON. No, sir.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill as in Committee of the Whole. It enacts that the Treasurer of the United States shall pay to the legal representatives of General James C. Watson, late of the State of Georgia, deceased, $14,600, with six per cent. interest per annum from May 8, 1838, until paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, being the amount paid by him, under the sanction of the Indian agent, to certain Creek warriors for slaves captured by said warriors while they were in the service of the United States against the Seminole Indians in Florida.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Is there a report accompanying the bill? I should like to know why interest should be paid in this case. If I understand the reading of the bill correctly, it provides for the payment of interest?

Mr. BADGER. I would suggest, that if interest is provided for, there must surely be an oversight on the part of my friend from Georgia, and he will move to strike out that provision immediately.

Mr. DAWSON. There is a report accompanying the bill, which I hope will be read.

The report of the Committee on Claims of the House was read, from which it appears that at the first session of the Thirtieth Congress, a report was made on the case, in which the committee fully concur; and also one made at the Twenty-seventh Congress, which contains a correct statement of the material facts, in the conclusions of which report the committee of the Thirtieth Congress concur, except as to the amount which, upon principles of justice and good faith, ought to be allowed. Believing the advancement of $14,600, made by Mr. Watson to the agent of the Creek Indians, was made under circumstances to produce a confident belief that the Government would cause the slaves then in its possession for safe-keeping, to be delivered to the Creeks, or their properly-authorized agent or agents, in accordance with the agreement entered into by General Jesup and the Creek warriors, and ratified, as the committee conceive, by the Government, and which was probably the main inducement for the Creeks to take part against the Seminoles, but which, from high considerations of humanity and policy, was not done; and Mr. Watson and his representatives having been in no default, they recommend an indemnity equal to the amount advanced by Mr. Watson, with six per cent. interest from May 8, 1838, until paid.

Mr. DAWSON. I will state to my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRODHEAD] the reason why the committee of both Houses have agreed to recommend the payment of interest. The amount of $14,600 was advanced by General Watson to the Government. They gave him an order instantly upon the War Department to pay the money here; but when he got here they had not the money. The case has been reported upon, I believe, at every Congress for the last twelve years, and it has finally passed the House of Representatives. The principle upon which they put in the interest is this: The money was advanced to the Government, and the debt was recognized. That is the only ground upon which they claim the interest, and the Committee on Indian Affairs unanimously recommend it. My course upon the subject of interest grew out of the fact, that wherever the Government is indebted, it is presumed to have the money to pay it; but when it gives an order, and the money is not paid, but the payment is delayed from time to time, the case is altered, and the interest should be paid. That is the case, as I think the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs will bear me out in saying.

Mr. CHASE. This is a bill which involves a principle of very considerable importance. It is one upon which I desire to submit a few remarks to the Senate. The bill has been taken up out of its regular order, and I am not prepared to make my remarks at this time; I therefore move that its further consideration be postponed until next Friday.

Mr. ADAMS. I desire to inquire how long the bill has been in possession of the Senate?

Mr. DAWSON. Some weeks.

Mr. ADAMS. Then Senators have had time to prepare themselves for its consideration; and, if a majority are prepared to vote upon it, I hope we will do it now.

Mr. DAWSON. I trust my friend from Ohio will withdraw his objection to considering the bill at this time. I trust the bill will give rise to no discussion. I see no necessity for debating it, as it provides for satisfying a clear right which is recognized everywhere; and the parties have been for a long time kept out of the money which is due to them. I will be very much obliged to him if he will withdraw his motion. The whole proceedings in the bill are entirely in accordance with his views, as I will submit to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. ATCHISON. Yes, sir; the persons in regard to whom the claim originated were individuals that should have been slaves. It was agreed to by General Jesup, and sanctioned by this Government, that the Creeks should have, in consideration of their assisting the United States in the war against the Seminoles, all this kind of property which they should take; but, instead of turning them over to the Creeks, it never was done. General Watson advanced the $14,000, reported in the bill, to satisfy them; so that the Senator's Free-Soil views, his humane views, in this instance were carried out by the Government at the expense of Watson.

Mr. CHASE. I would very cheerfully, at the request of the Senator from Georgia, withdraw the motion which I made, if I did not really believe, from the attention I have given to the subject, that the bill involves an important principle to which I desire to ask the candid consideration of the Senate. I know it was largely debated in the House of Representatives; and while I would not go into any unnecessary discussion of its merits, I am very desirous to have a little opportunity to arrange the ideas which I desire to present to the Senate on the subject. It is a courtesy which I believe the Senate has never refused, and I trust it will not be denied now.

Mr. BADGER. As it is probable that the further consideration of the bill will be postponed for the accommodation of the Senator from Ohio, and as I shall probably not be in my place next Friday, I will take the liberty of throwing out a suggestion for the benefit of my friend from Georgia. I am satisfied myself, from the statement made, that the interest upon this sum of money ought to be allowed. I cannot conceive such a thing as a man's lending money to the Government—making an advance of money to it—without the Government coming under an obligation to pay him the usual interest for the use of it. But I want to draw the attention of my friend from Georgia to this fact: He was very sure that poor Ira Day was not entitled to interest upon his small sum of money, though Mr. Watson, who I take to be from Georgia, is entitled to interest upon fourteen thousand and odd dollars. What is the difference between the two cases? Mr. Watson voluntarily made an advance of money to the Government, and did not stipulate for interest; but in the case of Ira Day, the Government's agent having, say, $1,000 of Ira's money, and being short of funds to carry on the Government, said to Ira, "You shall not have the $1,000, but we will keep it to use in the Department." That is what used to be called in old times a "forced loan." The point to which I wish to draw attention is this: If the Senator holds that interest ought not to be paid upon the forced loan, how can he hold that it ought to be paid upon a voluntary loan made without contracting for it?

Mr. DAWSON. In reply to that, I would say that I am a law-abiding man. Whenever the majority of the Senate decide a principle, I yield, and of course I consider myself under the control of the body, and driven to support the interest in this case. [Laughter.]

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

JOHN A. LYNCH.

On motion by Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, the bill for the relief of John A. Lynch was read a second time, and considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to John A. Lynch, for his services as clerk in that Department, from the 10th of August to the 7th of December, 1846, at the rate of three dollars per day.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Since the bill was reported from the Committee on Claims, the person for whose benefit it was reported has died, and I understand his widow is very much in need of money. I move to amend the bill, by inserting after the words "pay to," the words, "the widow of the late," so as to make it read, "That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to pay to the widow of the late John A. Lynch," &c.

The amendment was agreed to. The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; the amendment was concurred in; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. MASON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and

The Senate adjourned to Tuesday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, July 2, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

RIGHT OF WAY AND GRANTS OF LAND.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the consideration of a bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands, entitled a bill granting the right of way and a donation of land to the State of Alabama, to aid in the construction of the Memphis and Charleston, and Selma and Gunter's Landing, and Winchester and Tennessee river railroads, upon which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I rise to make a correction of the Journal. I did not vote upon the bill making a donation of land and granting the right of way to aid in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes, but stated that I had paired off with Mr. BOWIE, of Maryland. The Clerk misunderstood me. Mr. Bowie would have voted for the bill; I would have voted against it. He got it the reverse.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not recorded at all. The Chair recollects the remark made by the gentleman at the time, that he had paired off, and that he was opposed to the bill.

Mr. HAVEN. I desire to ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer, and put upon its passage, a joint resolution concerning a section of my State, and in which no other member, that I know of, is at all interested. Its consideration will take but a moment. If the House will hear it read, I am satisfied that there will be no objection to its introduction and adoption.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I insist on the regular order of business. I do not know what is the character of my friend's resolution; but there are other matters of great importance, which ought to be considered.

Mr. COBB. Will the Chair state the pending question upon the bill reported?

The SPEAKER. The pending question is upon the motion made by the gentleman that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COBB. I withdraw the motion to commit and to print.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I withdraw my objection to the introduction of the resolution of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] if the time taken in its consideration comes out of the morning hour. I do not care how that time is consumed.

Mr. OLDS. I object, if it is to be taken out of the morning hour. [Laughter.] That is the only important hour we have now in the whole day.

Mr. COBB. My object in moving, when this bill was last up, that it be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands, was, that it might come up this morning regularly for consideration. That motion I now withdraw. For the benefit of those who to any extent might interest themselves in the two great national roads I have been advocating, I have caused to be placed before the Clerk's desk two maps showing all the facts connected with them. If gentlemen will only put themselves to the trouble of giving the maps their examination, the importance of the proposed roads will be made manifest. They will form a link in the connection by railroad, of the various portions of the country; and the manner in which they perfect the communication is there demonstrated. Further, as I made the inquiry the other day, when in possession of the floor, whether there was a single gentleman opposed to these bills, and none having come forward, I move that the bill be put upon its passage; upon which motion I call for the previous question, so that we may have at once a direct vote. Rather than that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I ask that the House will vote it down. We will then know what we have to rely upon. I trust that the call for the previous question will be sustained, and that then a direct vote may be had upon the bill. If the bill is defeated, none will be more ready than myself to yield acquiescence in the will of the majority. If the bill is not to pass, let us know that fact now. I will not consume further the time of the House.

Mr. NABERS. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his call for the previous question. I am in favor of the bill, and desire to make a few remarks in regard to it.

Mr. COBB. I know the gentleman is in favor of it—

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman withdraw his call for the previous question?

Mr. COBB. I cannot. I hope the House will second the call.

The call for the previous question was then seconded.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Is it in order now to move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It is not, for the reason that the previous question has been demanded and seconded.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I move to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. ROBBINS demanded the yeas and nays upon the motion to lay upon the table; which were ordered.

Mr. COBB. Would it be proper to ask that the bill be read?

[Cries of "No, it is understood!" "We have had it read several times already!"]

The question was then put upon the motion to lay the bill upon the table, and it was agreed to—yeas 96, nays 61; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, John Appleton, Ashe, Averett, Babcock, David J. Bailey, Thomas H. Bayly, Beale, Bennett, Bibbhausa, Bocoek, Breckinridge, Brenton, Buell, Burrows, Burt, Joseph Cable, Caldwell, Lewis D. Campbell, Carter, Caskie, Chastain, Churchwell, Culloin, Curtis, Daniel, George T. Davis, Dawson, Dinmick, Edmundson, Ewing, Fitch, Floyd, Fowler, Gamble, Gaylord, Gentry, Giddings, Gilmore, Gorman, Grow, Hamilton, Isham G. Harris, Haven, Hebard, Hibbard, Hillyer, Holladay, Horsford, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jackson, Andrew Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, Preston King, Kuhns, Kurtz, Letcher, Mann, Mason, McMullin, McNair, McQueen, Meacham, Morrison, Murray, Newton, Oullaw, Andrew Parker, Samuel W. Parker, Perkins, Polk, Powell, Reed, Riddle, Robbins, Robie, Ross, Savage, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smart, Stanley, Benjamin Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stephens, Thaddeus Stevens, Sutherland, Sweetser, Benjamin Thompson, Walbridge, Wallace, Washburn, and Wells—96.

NAYS—Messrs. Willis Allen, William Appleton, Bissell, Bowie, John H. Boyd, Bragg, Briggs, Albert G. Brown, Busby, E. Carrington Cabell, Thompson Campbell, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Cottman, John G. Davis, Dockery, Doty, Freeman, Henry M. Fuller, Grey, Hammond, Sampson W. Harris, Hendricks, Houston, James John-on, John Johnson, Lockhart, Mace, Humphrey Marshall, Molony, John Moore, Nabers, Olds, Orr, Penn, Penniman, Phelps, Porter, Richardson, Robinson, Russell, Sackett, Scurry, Smith, Frederick P. Stanton, St. Martin, Strother, Stuart, Taylor, Thurston, Venable, Walsh, Ward, Watkins, Welch, Alexander White, Wilcox, Williams, and Yates—61.

So the bill was ordered to lie upon the table.

Previous to the announcement of the preceding vote,

Mr. ABERCROMBIE said: In consequence this morning of attending to business for my constituents before the Department, I did not reach the Hall until subsequent to the call of my name which, by the rule of the House, precludes me from voting. I was opposed to the laying of the bill upon the table. On Saturday morning I was detained from the House for the same cause, and I will therefore now state that I was opposed to every feature of the bill which passed in my absence, making a distribution of the public domain among the different States.

The SPEAKER. Reports are still in order from the Committee on Public Lands.

PUBLIC LANDS IN OHIO.

Mr. COBB. The Committee on Public Lands, after mature consideration, have directed me to report back Senate bill No. 2, entitled "An act to grant to the State of Ohio the unsold and unappropriated lands remaining in that State," and to move that it be laid upon the table. The committee did not think it advisable to commence separate legislation in giving away the public lands.

Mr. OLDS. Is it in order to move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. Not while the motion to lay upon the table is pending.

Mr. COBB. So far as I am connected with the Committee on Public Lands, I have resolved to consume no more time of the House. I do not intend to make another report during the remainder of the session.

Mr. OLDS. A Senate bill should receive the consideration of a reference from the House.

Mr. COBB. We have occupied time enough.

The question was put on the motion to lay upon the table, and, upon a division, there were—ayes 80—

Mr. OLDS. I demand the yeas and nays.

The House was divided on the demand for the yeas and nays, and there were—ayes 23; not a sufficient number.

Mr. SWEETSER demanded tellers on the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and Messrs. STANTON, of Tennessee, and WARD, were appointed.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. That gentlemen will put this bill in a position where it can be reached, if the bill sent to the Senate shall fail, is all that we ask. I trust the bill will be referred.

The SPEAKER. That can be done only by unanimous consent.

Mr. AVERETT. I object.

Mr. COBB. Let it go where the Committee on Public Lands recommended it should go.

Mr. OLDS. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ORR. I demand tellers on the motion to lay on the table. Gentlemen do not desire to discuss the bill, but only its reference to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. COBB. To see who it is that will give the public lands to the States, I demand the yeas and nays.

The House being divided on the demand for the yeas and nays, there were—ayes 23; not a sufficient number.

Mr. COBB. I demand tellers on the yeas and nays.

The House being divided on the demand for tellers, there were—ayes 17; not a sufficient number.

Mr. ORR. I demanded tellers on the motion to lay upon the table.

Tellers were ordered, and Messrs. STANTON, of Tennessee, and WARD, were appointed; and the question being taken, the tellers reported—ayes 87, noes 42.

So the bill was laid upon the table.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid upon the table.

Mr. JOHN W. HOWE. I move to lay that motion upon the table.

Mr. STANTON. I only ask that the motion be entered on the Journal.

The question was then taken upon Mr. Howe's motion, and it was agreed to.

So the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

Mr. HAMILTON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUTSON,] was laid upon the table, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question was then taken, and the latter motion was agreed to.

GRANTS TO INDIANA AND ILLINOIS.

Mr. ORR, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back without amendment House bill No. 287, "granting the right of way to the States of Indiana and Illinois, and a donation of public lands for the purpose of constructing a railroad from Springfield, in Illinois, via Danville, Covington, Crawfordsville, Lebanon, and Noblesville, to Andersonstown, in Indiana," and moved that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that it be printed.

Mr. JENKINS. Is a motion to lay that bill upon the table in order?

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

Mr. JENKINS. I then submit the motion.

The question was then taken, and the motion was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid upon the table, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question was then taken on the latter motion, and it was agreed to.

Mr. ORR, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill to establish additional land districts in the State of Wisconsin; which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. ORR. At the urgent solicitation of a portion of the Wisconsin delegation I shall move to put that bill upon its passage. It is a bill of local importance alone, and possesses no general public interest. It proposes to establish two new land districts embracing a territory amounting to some 16,000 square miles, nearly one third of the entire State of Wisconsin, known as Upper Wisconsin. From the center of each of the new districts proposed to be established, it is about one hundred miles to the nearest existing land office. In the winter season the land offices already in existence are very difficult of access, and from some portions of the district included within the bill that has been reported, it requires an expense of from $20 to $50 to reach the land offices, and in some cases a journey of two or three hundred miles. I have in my hands an extract from a letter from the acting Commissioner of Public Lands, which I ask permission to read:

"From the additional fact that all the lands embraced within the limits of the proposed districts are at points very remote from any of the existing land offices, that the country to a great extent is destitute of roads or means of communicating with the offices for the districts now including these lands, the propriety and necessity for the establishment of these districts, at this time, for the convenience of the settlers and the advancement of the public interest is manifest."

I will state, as an additional reason why the bill should pass, that the territory embraced within one of the districts is now just being surveyed, and when completed there will be brought into market one and a half or two millions of acres of public lands not heretofore subject to sale or entry, and the public convenience as well as the interests of the Treasury require the increased facilities provided by this bill.

The bill, in my judgment, ought to pass, and if the House choose to act upon it, it can act just as well now as at any future time, as it will not consume five minutes' time. I desire, before taking my seat, to make one more remark in vindication of the Committee on Public Lands. They were assailed, the other day, when a bill was introduced by my associate upon that committee, [Mr. CONN,] and nothing was said then in their defense. I know that this House has grown weary of reports from that committee, but the Committee on Public Lands have had referred to them more business at the present session of Congress than any other committee in this House. Six weeks ago, when complaints first began to reach my ears, that the Committee on Public Lands were consuming too much of the time of the House, I went to the docket of the committee and counted the number of cases which had been referred, and I found that there had been referred to that committee, at the present session, of memorials, resolutions, and bills, at that time, three hundred and forty-nine, embracing a great variety of subjects, and many of them of great importance, requiring much labor and investigation, and I have no doubt that at the present time the number would amount to more than four hundred. The committee, with its chairman now absent, [Mr. HALL,] (and there is no more indefatigable man in this House,) have labored most assiduously during the entire session. If the committee have reported too much here, I suppose it is a very rare complaint brought against any committee. Now, as to the statement that the committee have asked that bills be put upon their passage when they are reported here, I will say that, in every single instance the committee have acted according to the wishes of the gentlemen present—ing bills, and the majority of the House are responsible for the time consumed by the Committee on Public Lands; for when a bill is proposed to be put upon its passage, a majority of the House have it in their control, and not the Committee on Public Lands. They could send it to the Committee of the Whole, postpone its consideration, or lay it upon the table. Is it just, then, to charge the consumption of time to that committee, numbering but nine members? The responsibility is in the majority, and there let the blame fall if any blame attaches.

[A message was here received from the Senate, by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., its Secretary, that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to Senate bill No. 451, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to carry into effect the convention between the United States and the Emperor of Brazil, of the 27th day of January, in the year 1849,' approved March 29, 1850.'"]

Mr. CARTTER. I rise to a question of order. Is it in order for the honorable gentleman from South Carolina to consume still more of the time of the House in giving a biography of the Committee on Public Lands?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from South Carolina has wandered somewhat beyond the boundaries of legitimate discussion.

Mr. ORR. I propose to apply these remarks to this bill. I propose to show by them that this bill should not be rejected by the House because heretofore the committee have proposed to put other bills upon their passage. That fact alone should not operate against the passage of this bill. I had nearly concluded my remarks. When the Committee on Public Lands was assailed by my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] and then by the member from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] over the way the other day, when it was just as much out of order to have assailed them, I supposed that I would have been allowed at least the privilege of making a statement in vindication of that committee. But it is a matter of very little consequence, for the committee have a conscience void of all offense. I propose to put the bill upon its passage. I shall not demand the previous question. If any gentleman chooses to refer it to the Committee of the Whole, he can make that motion. It is a question of local interest alone, and the House can pass it about as soon as they can refer it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to ask the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] if it is the instruction of the Committee on Public Lands to put the bill upon its passage?

Mr. ORR. It is not.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to ask the gentleman another question. He says that it is a local question, and concerns no one else but the State of Wisconsin. I ask if the bill does not create additional land offices, and in order to put them in operation the appointment of new officers to discharge the duties of these offices, and will not all this incur additional expense, and if so, how much?

Mr. ORR. I am not prepared to answer the gentleman as to the exact expense. I believe the salary of the registers is $500 each, and then they are allowed certain perquisites. The salaries in any event cannot go beyond $3,000. The excess over $500 is paid by taxes upon those who enter lands, and those taxes would go just as well in the existing land offices as in the new land offices. The expense of registers and receivers for the two offices would amount to $2,000 only to be paid by the Government.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not know that I have investigated this subject very thoroughly, but in connection with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. EASTMAN] some days ago I examined a map of the country in which it is proposed by this bill to locate these land offices. That examination satisfied me it would be right to establish these offices. I obtained the information from what the gentleman said—that there are persons now in that portion of the State where they propose to establish these land offices, who have to go from two to three hundred miles, perhaps, to land offices for making entries; and in some instances, he assured me that it would cost a man almost as much to go from the places where these offices are proposed to be located to the present offices and back, as the land itself would cost when he should get there. I thought, under these circumstances, that it would be not only encouraging, but promoting the entry of public lands in that region, and that it would be an accommodation and convenience to those who wished to settle the lands there, which they have a right to ask and demand of the Government. As to the expense—there will be paid $500 to each of the two receivers and registers, making $2,000, out of the Treasury. Whatever commissions may be paid to them upon the amount received for lands entered, would have to be paid, if they should go to any other office and enter the lands there. So the additional expense, if I am correct, in establishing these two offices would not exceed $2,000 per annum. If there is no objection, I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and having been engrossed was read the third time and passed.

Mr. ORR moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

GRANTS TO INDIANA AND ILLINOIS.

Mr. ORR, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back, without amendment, the bill granting the right of way and a portion of the public lands to the States of Indiana and Illinois to aid in the construction of a railroad from Springfield, Illinois, to Terre Haute, in Indiana.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I move that that bill be put upon its passage. I do not desire to discuss the question at this time. It is a bill upon which I desire to make a few remarks before I make the motion that I design making. This bill was introduced by myself at the early part of the present session. It was referred to the Committee on Public Lands five months ago, I believe; and that committee have reported it back, with a recommendation that it be passed. I believe it is the last bill, or, at all events, the last but one, now to be reported back from the Committee on Public Lands. I know, sir, that the House has become somewhat weary in consequence of the great length of time consumed by the committee in making its reports. I do not desire that this bill should go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, nor do I desire to take up the time of the House at present in discussing its merits; but I think that when that time arrives I shall be perfectly able to show, that if there is merit in a single bill reported to the present House in regard to the construction of railroads upon the alternate section principle, there is merit in this bill. But in order to allow the committee to go on and finish their reports, so that the House may take them up, I ask the unanimous consent of the House that the consideration of this bill be postponed for two weeks from this day.

[Cries of "Agreed!" "Agreed!"]

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana has a right to move to postpone the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. JENKINS. Is it in order to make a motion to lay the bill upon the table?

The SPEAKER. It will be so when the gentleman gets the floor for that purpose. The gentleman from Indiana is now upon the floor. The motion to postpone, however, is not debatable.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not desire to discuss the bill at this time. I merely make a motion that the consideration of this bill be postponed for two weeks from to-day.

Mr. JENKINS. I move to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to make an inquiry as to the effect of the gentleman's motion. Supposing this bill shall be deferred for two weeks, and the House shall have passed from the Committee on Public Lands, will this come up then in the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would probably come up as the unfinished business, during the call for reports within the morning hour.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I would inquire if the morning hour has expired?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has not yet expired.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia. Upon the motion to lay the bill on the table I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BOGOCCK. I wish to inquire if the morning hour has expired?

The SPEAKER. It has not by two minutes and a half.

The question being then taken upon the motion to lay the bill upon the table, it was decided in the negative—yeas 71, nays 86; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Charles Allen, Allison, John Appleton, Ashe, Averett, Babcock, David J. Bailey, Thomas H. Bayly, Bennett, Bibbhaus, Boeck, J. H. Boyd, Bragg, Buell, Purrows, Burt, Caldwell, Chastain, Churchill, Daniel, Dawson, Dinmick, Dockery, Edmundson, Faulkner, Floyd, Fowler, Gamble, Giddings, Gilmore, Gudenow, Grey, Grow, Hamilton, Hebard, Hillyer, Holladay, Horsford, John W. Howe, Hunter, Ingersoll, Ives, Jenkins, James Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, Preston King, Kurtz, Mann, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, McMullin, McQueen, Meacham, Meade, Murphy, Murray, Newton, Outlaw, Perkins, Reed, Robie, Ross, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smith, Thaddeus Stevens, Sutherland, Walbridge, Wallace, Washburn, and Wells—71.

NAYS—Messrs. Abernethy, Willis Allen, Bell, Bissell, Brenton, Briggs, Brooks, Albert G. Brown, Busby, J. Cable, Lewis D. Campbell, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Chandler, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Cottam, Cullom, George T. Davis, John G. Davis, Disney, Dockery, Doty, Dunham, Durkee, Fitch, Freeman, Henry M. Fuller, Gaylord, Gorman, Isham G. Harris, Sumpson W. Harris, Haws, Haven, Hendricks, Houston, Thomas M. Howe, Jackson, John Johnson, Kuhns, Landry, Lockhart, Mac, McCorkle, McNair, Molony, John Moore, Morrison, Nabers, Olds, Orr, Andrew Parker, Samuel W. Parker, Penn, Pennington, Phelps, Polk, Porter, Richardson, Riddle, Robinson, Russell, Sackett, Schofield, Scurry, Stanley, Benjamin Stanton, Frederick P. Stanton, St. Martin, Stratton, Strother, Stuart, Sweetser, Taylor, Thurston, Toombs, Townsend, Walsh, Ward, Watkins, Welch, Alexander White, Wilcox, Williams, and Yates—86.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

The question recurred upon the motion to postpone the consideration of the bill for two weeks.

Mr. DAVIS. I withdraw that motion, and move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I now insist upon the Pennsylvania contested-election case being taken up. I believe that is the first business in order.

The SPEAKER. That is the first business in order, the morning hour having expired. The question is upon the adoption of the resolution reported by the Committee on Elections.

The previous question was demanded and seconded.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the election at the Danville precinct, county of Montour, eleventh Congressional district, in the State of Pennsylvania, was illegally and irregularly conducted, and the seat of the member from that district is vacant; and that the Speaker inform the Governor of that State of the decision of this House, that a new election may be ordered.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is it in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is not, the previous question having been seconded.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that there is a bill reported back from the Senate, having passed both Houses, in relation to the treaty with Brazil. He is also informed that the bill, if to be effective at all, must be acted upon finally to-day. He is also informed that no one member of the Committee on Enrolled Bills is in his seat. It will be for the House to determine whether they will waive the examination on the part of that committee, and permit the bill to be signed.

Mr. HOUSTON. Cannot we appoint two additional members on that committee, and let them examine the bill?

The SPEAKER. If it is the pleasure of the House, the Chair will appoint two additional members.

Mr. STUART. It is unnecessary to adopt such a course. The members of the committee are only temporarily absent.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Speaker will sign the bill.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. If the Speaker is satisfied that the bill is right, there can be no objection.

No objection was made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will examine the bill before signing it.

RESIGNATION OF MR. THOMPSON.

The Chair also begs leave to inform the House that he has received a letter from the Hon. GEORGE W. THOMPSON, of Virginia, resigning his seat upon this floor.

THE CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. ASHE. Do I understand that the question is upon ordering the main question to be now put?

The SPEAKER. The main question has been ordered to be put, and the question is upon the adoption of the resolution reported by the Committee on Elections.

Mr. ASHE then took the floor, and spoke in defense of the action of the Committee on Elections, and in reply to Mr. TOOMBS. [His speech will be found in the Appendix.]

The SPEAKER. The question now is upon the adoption of the resolution reported by the committee, which will be read by the Clerk.

The resolution heretofore reported was read.

Mr. POLK. I have examined this case, and cannot concur in the report of the committee. I therefore move to lay the whole subject upon the table.

Mr. ROSS. Will it be in order to move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. Such a motion would not now be in order.

Mr. ROSS. Then I call for the yeas and nays upon the motion made by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK.]

Mr. HAMILTON. I move that the House do now adjourn, and upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays, so that we may get a full House.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken, and there were—yeas 4, nays 152.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon the motion of the gentlemen from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK,] to lay the whole subject upon the table, and upon that motion the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROSS] demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. POLK, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 87, nays 74; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Charles Allen, Allison, William Appleton, Bell, Bennett, Bibbhausa, Bocoek, Bowie, John H. Boyd, Brenton, Briggs, Brooks, Burrows, Burt, E. Carrington Cabell, Caldwell, Lewis D. Campbell, Chandler, Clingman, Cullom, George T. Davis, Dockery, Edmundson, Ewing, Faulkner, Fowler, Gaylord, Giddings, Goodenow, Grey, Harper, Haws, Haven, Hcbard, Horsford, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Hunter, Jenkins, James Johnson, John Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, Preston King, Kulms, Landry, Letcher, Mann, Humphrey Marshall, McCorkle, Meacham, Meade, John Moore, Nabers, Newton, Outlaw, Samuel W. Parker, Penniman, Perkins, Polk, Porter, Price, Reed, Schoolcraft, Schoonmaker, Scudder, Stanley, Benjamin Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Thindus Stevens, Stone, Strother, Sutherland, Taylor, Benj. Thompson, Thurston, Toombs, Walbridge, Ward, Washburn, Watkins, Welch, Wells, Addison White, Williams, and Yates—87.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, Willis Allen, John Appleton, Ashe, Averett, David J. Bailey, Bragg, Breckinridge, Buell, Busby, Joseph Cable, Carter, Caskie, Chastain, Churchwell, Clark, Cobb, Cottman, Curtis, Daniel, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dimmick, Disney, Doty, Dunham, Fitch, Floyd, Freeman, Gamble, Gilmore, Hamilton, Isham G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Hibbard, Hillyer, Holladay, Houston, Ingersoll, Ives, Jackson, Andrew Johnson, Kurtz, Lockhart, Mace, Mason, McNair, McQueen, Molony, Morrison, Murray, Olds, Orr, Andrew Parker, Phelps, Richardson, Robbins, Robinson, Ross, Russell, Savage, Scurry, Skelton, Smart, Frederick P. Stanton, Abraham P. Stephens, St. Martin, Stratton, Stuart, Sweetser, Townshend, Venable, Wallace, and Wilcox—74.

So the whole subject was laid upon the table.

Mr. HENDRICKS stated that in the above vote, he had paired off with Mr. DUNCAN.

Mr. GROW stated that he had paired off with Mr. WHITE, who was opposed to the majority report.

Mr. McMULLIN stated that he had paired off with Mr. SCHERMEHORN; and Mr. PENN stated that he had paired off with Mr. MILLER, and that he (Mr. PENN) would have sustained the report of the committee.

Mr. POLK. I move to reconsider the vote just passed, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move that the House do now adjourn, and upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. POLK. I withdraw my motion to reconsider.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then I withdraw my motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER here informed the House that there was no committee upon the part of the House on enrolled bills, to join the committee on the part of the Senate, to present a bill for the signature of the President; and the President will not sign a bill without the action of that joint committee.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move that the Speaker appoint two members upon the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the Speaker will appoint two members upon that committee.

No objection was made, and the Speaker acted accordingly.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to offer the resolution which I send to the Speaker's table.

The resolution was read for information, as follows:

Resolved, That until otherwise ordered, the daily hour of meeting of the House of Representatives be fixed at eleven o'clock, a. m.

[Cries of "Agreed!" "Agreed!"]

Mr. JENKINS. I object to it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move that the rules of the House be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was then taken, and it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. STUART in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated that the business first in order before the committee was the consideration of House bill No. 207, being a bill to supply deficiencies in the appropriation for services for the fiscal year ending the 30th day of June, 1852; and that upon that question the gentleman from New York [Mr. WELLS] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. WELLS addressed the committee an hour on the subject of intervention. [His speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. TOOMBS next obtained the floor.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will ask the honorable gentleman from Georgia, as I suppose he does not purpose to address the House to-day, to allow me to move that House bill No. 43, making appropriations for the service of the Indian department, be reported to the House, for the purpose of passing it. The appropriations contained in it are all controlled by treaty stipulations and express law. The Senate declines to take up the resolution passed by the House, proposing an adjournment until we send them some appropriation bills. This bill has been discussed in committee two or three weeks, or at least it has been up for discussion, and I should like now to authorize the chairman to report it to the House, that action may be had upon it there, so that we may send it to the Senate. I ask the chairman to put the question to the committee.

Mr. HOWARD. The Committee on Indian Affairs have some important amendments which they desire to make to that bill, and I shall be under the necessity of objecting to its being reported to the House until that committee have had an opportunity to offer their amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be for the committee to say whether it shall be reported or not.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I object.

Mr. HOUSTON. I suppose a mere objection will not prevent the question being taken.

Mr. STEPHENS. It will prevent its being reported, because there is no quorum present.

Mr. HOUSTON. That makes a difference, if there is no quorum, but an objection of itself will not do.

Mr. STEPHENS. An objection will do. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TOOMBS] has the floor upon this particular bill, and you cannot lay aside that bill, by the mere motion of the gentleman from Alabama, without the gentleman from Georgia yielding the floor for that purpose.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not desire to interfere with the gentleman from Georgia. All I desire to do is to get the bill reported to the House, in order that it may go to the Senate, and the gentleman can make his speech upon another bill.

Mr. STEPHENS. But there is no quorum present, and it could not be ordered to be reported to the House without—

Mr. ORR. Let me make a suggestion. The gentleman from Texas states that he has amendments to offer to this appropriation bill. Now, that is conclusive why it cannot be taken up and reported to the House. You cannot report it so long as any member chooses to offer amendments.

Mr. HOUSTON. But the bill has been before the committee for two or three weeks open to amendment. If the Committee on Indian Affairs had amendments to offer they could have offered them at any time. If the gentleman has an amendment now which he desires to offer, I am perfectly willing he should offer it. It seems to me that it is better to take up this appropriation bill, in order that the House may act upon it.

Mr. CLINGMAN. There seems to be a difficulty in relation to this matter which is not to be got rid of in this way. I move that the committee do now rise, if the gentleman from Georgia will yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. TOOMBS. I will yield.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 207, being the deficiency bill, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a motion, that when this House adjourns it adjourn to meet at eleven o'clock instead of twelve.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. There are not enough present to pass that motion. I object.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I would not object if the motion were made so as to take effect on Monday next.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I am not particular about that. I will make that motion if there is no objection.

Mr. JONES. I object, and move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the House adjourned till to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

PETITIONS, &amp;c.

The following petitions, memorials, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. SMART: The petition of John Moore, of Cushing, Maine, for payment of bounty.

By Mr. MOORE, of Louisiana: The petition of E. T. King and 89 others, inhabitants of the vicinity, praying for the establishment of a post route from Charenton, in the parish of St. Mary, to Bayou Chêne, in the parish of St. Martin, Louisiana.

Also, the petition of 63 inhabitants of the vicinity, praying for a post route to, and post office at, Armanville, in the parish of St. Landry, Louisiana.

By Mr. CHANDLER: The memorial of Messrs. Stuart & Brother, of Philadelphia, asking relief for duties paid and payable merchandise destroyed by fire.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, July 3, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the motion to recommit House bill No. 289, granting a right of way and a portion of the public lands to the States of Indiana and Illinois, to aid in the construction of a railroad from Springfield, Illinois, to Terre Haute, in Indiana.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I insist upon the regular order of business.

On motion by Mr. LETCHER, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw the papers in the case of Richard Rohan, from the files of the House, for the purpose of having them referred to one of the Executive Departments.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I now call for the regular order of business.

Mr. FREEMAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present a couple of petitions and have them referred.

Mr. CLINGMAN. That can be done under the rule. I object.

GRANT OF LAND TO INDIANA AND ILLINOIS.

The question now being upon the motion to recommit bill No. 289.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, said: If it be in order, I will withdraw the motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands, and move that its further consideration be postponed till Tuesday, the 13th day of the present month.

The question was put, and the motion to postpone was agreed to.

GRANT OF LAND TO MICHIGAN.

Mr. ORR, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the State of Michigan, to aid in the construction of the Oakland and Ottawa railroad, commencing at the village of Pontiac, in the county of Oakland, and terminating on the navigable waters of Lake Michigan, in the county of Ottawa; which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. ORR. I do not propose to make a speech upon the bill; nor do I propose to put it upon its passage. The committee have examined the bill, and it has as much merit as any bill that has been reported. If any bill has merit, I think that has. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STUART] may make any motion with reference to the bill as may suit his purpose.

Mr. STUART. I do not propose to detain the House one moment in regard to this bill. I flatter myself that when I have an opportunity I can satisfy gentlemen who will vote for such measures under any circumstances, that it is as meritorious, and entitled to as favorable consideration, as any similar measure which has been reported to this House. What I propose to do, and what I now ask the unanimous consent of the House to do, is to postpone the further consideration of the bill till the day assigned for the one which has just been disposed of. I move to postpone the further consideration of this bill until Tuesday, the 13th instant.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to propound a question to the gentleman from Michigan before his motion is put to the House: How much land is it proposed to appropriate in this bill?

Mr. STUART. I cannot answer the gentleman definitely at present. I have a report from the Commissioner of the Land Office, which, at the proper time, I can furnish to the House. But it has passed my recollection for the present, and I cannot give the gentleman a definite answer.

The question was then taken, and the motion to postpone was agreed to.

LAND SURVEYS.

Mr. FREEMAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill to amend the act entitled "An act for the discontinuance of the surveyor general in the several districts as soon as the surveys therein shall be completed, and for abolishing land offices, under certain circumstances, and for other purposes," which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. FREEMAN. I desire to say in relation to this matter, that the office of surveyor general in the State of Mississippi has been abolished. There are a great many tracts of land in the State which require to be resurveyed. Under the existing laws in relation to this subject, the Commissioner of the General Land Office has no power to make these surveys; in consequence of which he has furnished to the Committee on Public Lands a bill in relation to this matter, which meets with the sanction of the General Land Office. I now ask that the bill may be read through, and I will then move that it be put upon its passage.

The bill was then read through by the Clerk.

Mr. FREEMAN. I wish to say that the bill has been recommended by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. It has also received the approval of the Committee on Public Lands in this House. I hope the House will suffer it to pass.

Mr. CARTTER. I desire to inquire if this bill has been printed?

The SPEAKER. It has not been printed.

Mr. CARTTER. I would suggest that if the public interest would not suffer by the little delay, it would be better to have the bill printed, so that gentlemen may examine it.

Mr. FREEMAN. That is not necessary. This is a mere arrangement to enable the Commissioner of the General Land Office to have certain lands surveyed, which cannot be done without.

Mr. CARTTER. But is not the bill general in its provisions?

Mr. FREEMAN. It merely provides for the survey of these lands.

Mr. CARTTER. I understand the bill to be one of general interest, and to relate to the land policy generally, and I would like, if the Committee on Public Lands would not deem it prejudicial to their success, that the House should have an opportunity of seeing it in print.

Mr. HOUSTON. I should like to ask the gentleman from Mississippi a question. From the reading of the bill at the Clerk's desk, I did not comprehend precisely its provisions. I ask the gentleman from Mississippi what change it proposes to make in the existing laws upon the subject of surveys?

Mr. FREEMAN. The object of the bill is simply to enable the Commissioner of the General Land Office to have these lands surveyed where the surveyor general's office has been abolished.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am aware of the object of the bill, but the gentleman from Mississippi did not understand my question. I wish to know what changes it proposes to make in the existing laws. I desire to know whether it proposes to create any additional officers or to incur any additional expense. As I understood it from the reading, it merely furnishes authority for the Commissioner of the General Land Office to have these lands surveyed without the appointment of any additional officers.

Mr. FREEMAN. That is all.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi. This bill was drawn up at the General Land Office, at my suggestion, and it was designed to meet a case like the one I will instance, and which has to be met in some form of general legislation, or some special legislation like this. Forty years ago, a citizen residing in my district had a grant of land from the Spanish Government. When the American surveys came to be made, the line which bounded his land was run across by the American surveyors, so that his six hundred acres of land came to lie in three different sections, and though there was no question as to the amount of land he was entitled to, the Government never could make him a patent for the same, because they never could ascertain, without a resurvey, how much was contained in one section, and how much in another, and how much in a third. He is now asking for a patent for his land. The Government cannot have a survey made because the surveyor general's office has been abolished, and there is no one authorized to make such a survey. This is only one case, but there are a number of others in that State; and there are cases like it in some respects, though not precisely the same in all its features, in all the land States.

This bill simply proposes to authorize the Commissioner of the General Land Office to have such a survey made by the authority of the Government. Private individuals cannot do it, for however carefully and accurately such a survey might be made by private authority, it could not be recognized by the Government here, so as to authorize the issuing of a patent. It cannot be done by State authority, or by any other than the authority of the United States.

This bill was drawn at the Land Office with a view to meet cases of this kind.

Mr. DISNEY, (interrupting.) With the consent of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. BROWN], I want to state another case, exactly in point. In the State of Ohio, an application was made to enter an island, which had escaped the attention of the surveyors of the United States. The title to the island remained in the Government, and there is no officer authorized to make a survey now; and we want a power, such as that contemplated by this bill, to authorize the land office to cause a survey to be made.

Mr. BROWN. In conclusion, I am authorized to say, by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, that there are cases in all the land States in the Union, which can never be provided for without the passage of this bill, or something like it. I trust there will be no objection to its passage.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] if this bill covers the case of disputed right to land at Cincinnati?

Mr. DISNEY. It does not.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The question was then put, and it was agreed to.

The bill having been engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BROWN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. POLK. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer a resolution, which I send to the Clerk's table.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Will the time consumed in the consideration of the gentleman's resolution come out of the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. POLK. It will not consume much time, and when the gentleman hears the resolution, he will not object to it.

Mr. CLINGMAN. If the time does not come out of the morning hour, I am satisfied.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read for information.

The resolution was then read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House pay out of the contingent fund of this House, to Hendrick B. Wright, the same compensation per diem and mileage allowed to members of Congress, from the commencement of the present session of the present Congress to the second day of July inclusive.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, and Mr. LETCHER severally objected.

Mr. POLK. Is it in order to move a suspension of the rules?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to know if it is not in order to offer such a resolution, notwithstanding objections? I think it does not require the unanimous consent of the House to introduce it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair differs in opinion with the gentleman, and overrules his point.

Mr. OLDS. We are now acting under a special order. You can introduce it on Monday.

Mr. POLK. Will it be in order to offer it after the expiration of the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. The Chair doubts whether it could come in at all to-day, except by unanimous consent. It is in the nature of a private claim.

GRANTS FOR RAILROADS IN ALABAMA.

Mr. WATKINS, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back, without amendment, House bill granting to the State of Alabama the right of way and a portion of the public lands, to aid in the construction of a railroad from Girard to the waters of the Mobile Bay, in said State.

Mr. WATKINS. At the solicitation of the committee, and of the individual who introduced the bill, I ask that the bill may be read and put upon its passage.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. Before this bill is acted upon, I desire to draw the attention of the House to its merits. The bill proposes to grant the right of way and a portion of the public lands to aid in the construction of a railroad from Girard, in the State of Alabama, to the waters of the Mobile Bay, a distance of two hundred and thirty miles. That road has already been surveyed, and there is at this time a number of hands employed in constructing it. Some forty-one miles of the road is already under contract, and it is entirely in the hands of the planting interest of that country. The road is not a matter of speculation of any kind, but is being constructed for the purpose of making a direct route to a market, for the want of which we are suffering very much in that country. It passes the line of prairie land, directly on the edge of it for some one hundred miles. West of that line is the Alabama river. It is with very great difficulty that the planters get their crops over prairie lands and they are subject to heavy losses. They are subject to high freight, in hauling their cotton to the river. They have to ship it to Mobile by the river, and sometimes it costs five dollars per bale to carry it thirty or forty miles.

In addition to that, sir, Chattahoochee river, where this road commences, is not navigable for seven or eight months in the year. We have to purchase every article of supply for our family use at New Orleans. Eight months in the year the Chattahoochee is not navigable. We have to pay as high as fifteen cents a pound for our bacon.

Corn is selling for a dollar a bushel at this time. If this road is constructed, we could reach New Orleans in one day, and get our supplies at a much less price than we now pay.

The planters on the line of road have agreed to grade one hundred and seventy miles of it, and to receive pay for the same in stock. In addition, we have four hundred and four thousand in cash subscribed. A survey has already been made, and the estimated cost of the road, fully completed, is about $2,900,000. That is a very heavy work to be undertaken without any foreign aid, and only by farmers living upon the line.

In addition to this, sir, Government would be greatly benefited by this road, if it were built, by the transportation upon it of the great Southern mail. Government is now paying $33,000 per annum for carrying the mail from Montgomery to Mobile. By the completion of this road, the great connecting link between New York and New Orleans, the distance between those places will be much shortened, and the Government will be greatly benefited by the transportation of the mail between those places, through that country, and over that road. Not only the distance, but the cost of transportation will be materially reduced. Besides, it connects at Mobile with the Ohio railroad. It connects with every road in Georgia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Virginia, on to New York. It is the last connecting link, and is all-important to the whole traveling community. I think I shall be able to show that the Government cannot lose by this operation, and may be benefited by it. The principal portion of the public lands through which this road passes has been offered for sale by the Government for more than thirty years, and until recently but a very small portion of these lands has been taken up. But since this survey commenced, at the expense of a few individuals, for the purpose of trying to get a market for their produce, the Government has received from $70,000 to $80,000 for lands lying upon that road. Well, sir, the lands which are unsold there are poor pine lands, and only valuable for their timber, and, unless that timber can be made available for this improvement, the lands cannot be disposed of.

Now, sir, I do not pretend to beg lands of this House, or of this Government; but if it can be made to appear that the Government is not to be injured by it, but that the State and National Governments are to be benefited, I do not see any good reason why this bill should not pass. There are public lands lying there which pay no tax to our State, and they are not benefiting the State in any way, and never will, unless this road is built, or something of the kind is done to make those lands valuable.

Mr. Speaker, I think if the House will reflect for one moment, and look at the true condition of that country, and look at the operation of the bill which passed this House a few days ago, making a distribution of the public lands among the several States of the Union, and see how unfairly it operates upon the State of Alabama, they will not hesitate to pass this bill. That State has paid more money into the public Treasury, I venture the assertion, than any other State in the Union, according to its territorial limits. And yet, sir, under the operation of the bill to which I have alluded, and which was passed a few days ago, those lands, although they have been offered for sale some thirty-odd years, will remain there for as many years more, unless they are made salable by improvements of this character. The State of Alabama is compelled, sir, to take her portion of the lands in her own State, when the old States have a right to go into the new States, and to take their choice of the public lands in the whole country. Alabama will thus be obliged to take lands which have been offered for sale for thirty-odd years, and which cannot be made valuable unless by means of this kind. I say that, under the operation of that law, Alabama will be treated with injustice, though I have no idea it was in the contemplation of this House to do so, in the passage of that bill. I do not believe they understood the true condition of that section of country. The previous question was called upon the bill, and it was not in the power of any member from that State to show the true condition of matters in that State. The moment it was read in the House, the previous question was called upon it.

The farmers of that country are and have been making a great effort to construct this road. They have a deep interest in it. Without the aid asked for here, it is feared they will not be enabled to complete its construction. Its building is now being proceeded with in good faith, and they are resolved to continue to progress with it as long as their means last. I have hands working on the road at this time, and the farmers all around that region of country have two, some three and four hands, assisting in its construction. The farmers wish a cheap, speedy, and safe communication with market. I am certain, if the true condition of that country were known, the House would not hesitate a single moment to pass the bill. The Government will not lose, but they have every prospect of gaining by it. It will cause to be sold lands which otherwise would remain in market; which would, probably, remain on the hands of the Government unsold for years.

Mr. ALLISON. With the gentleman's permission, I will ask him a question. I understand the gentleman from Alabama complained of the operations of the bill passed on last Saturday, because his State, in her selection, would be confined to lands lying within her limits, those lands having remained in market unsold for the last thirty years. They are of course not so valuable as lands lying within the limits of the new States. Now, if that is a subject of complaint, why does the gentleman ask for an appropriation of the same lands for this road? It is proposed, I think, to take land within the borders of the State for the road. He can get none other. Why, then, should he complain of the grants made in the general bill passed last Saturday?

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. I will reply to the gentleman's inquiry promptly. I have stated that those lands are not now valuable, and cannot be made so unless an improvement of the character proposed in the bill under consideration shall be constructed through them. That is my answer.

Mr. ALLISON. Then if those lands are to be made valuable by the construction of this road, I would inquire of the gentleman why he does not apply to the Legislature of Alabama for a grant of a portion of the lands given to her by the bill passed on last Saturday?

Mr. COBB. That bill has not yet passed into law, nor will it this Congress.

Mr. ALLISON. It is true it is not yet law; but so far as this House is concerned, it is law. Those on this side who are in favor of it, intend they must rely on that act of appropriation.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. We would prefer to get the grant now. The work is now progressing, and assistance is needed at this time. The Legislature will not again meet for two years to come. If that bill were to pass, we would not get the appropriation for that length of time.

When the Government is to be advantaged and not injured by the grant asked, is there any good reason why it should be refused? I do not wish to be understood as impeaching the motives of members. They are no doubt voting in accordance with what their judgment dictates to be correct. This I believe to be the plainest case ever submitted to a legislative body for its action. The land which will be granted to the road is now poor and valueless. They will be immensely improved in value by the construction of the proposed road. If the bill be not passed, this land will remain in market for years yet to come unsold. There is at the present time in this city a gentleman from Georgia, Judge Iverson, who owned a large tract of land of a similar quality to that asked to be granted to aid in the construction of the railroad I am advocating. A few days ago he stated to me that he had an interest in sixty thousand acres of land, which they recently disposed of for $5,000. Were a railroad constructed through that land its value would be enhanced immensely. When an effort of the character now being made by the farmers of Alabama—entirely and alone by them—for the purpose of opening a cheap, speedy, and safe communication with market, and when not a speculator has got an interest in the road, it seems to me it should be aided by the Government in the way proposed in the bill. If members of the House have confidence in what I have said, they will pass the bill. I am, however, aware that the present is an inauspicious time to ask the grant. I know that there exists feeling against bills of its character; but I believe this is one against which no feeling ought to exist.

Whatever may be the determination of the House, I shall be reconciled to it. I am, as I have stated before, convinced in my own judgment that it should pass.

Mr. AVERETT. If the gentleman has concluded his remarks, I shall make a motion and assign a single reason for so doing.

Mr. SNOW. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama one question before he resumes his seat. Does this bill provide for the increasing of the price of the alternate sections reserved to the Government to $2 50 per acre?

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. It does.

Mr. SNOW. The gentleman has said that the land proposed to be granted is poor. I will ask him, then, whether he had not better accept the conditions of the bill lately passed by this House, and which does not increase the price of the land to $2 50 per acre? If that land is poor, it certainly is for the benefit of the gentleman and his constituents, and for the settlers who may locate upon it, to accept it under the conditions of the bill passed on Saturday.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. I will reply to the gentleman by stating that I disapprove of that portion of the bill to which he alludes; but it is embraced in every bill of the kind which has been passed, or is now before the House. I think the price of these lands ought not to be increased in value, for the reason that I am of opinion that it is at present too high. The price is so high that they cannot be disposed of. The provision has only been inserted to make the bill conform to those which have already been passed, and those now before the House.

Mr. SNOW. That is what the general bill is intended to obviate. It is a condition which this Government should not enforce upon the people of the new States, and settlers. In raising the price of the alternate sections, the Government becomes a common speculator, in connection with this special legislation. It is a condition antagonistic to the interests of the people of that State, and the settlers upon these lands—forcing back the man who goes there with but a small portion of money in his possession, and giving power to the man holding capital to locate upon these particular sections.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. There is no fear the people will object to that provision if the grant be made. They desire this aid. The road is in the hands of the farmers, and they are endeavoring to render their estates, through which the road will pass, valuable by its construction. For nearly half the distance of the road, there is very little public land. It is only in the lower country where land will be obtained in any quantity near the waters of Mobile bay.

If the gentleman insists we should make this request to the Legislature, I reply to him that we will be unable so to do, as it will not be in session for two years to come. In the mean time we would be losing considerable in the way of interest on the money already expended. Again, I repeat that there is no speculation in this road. It is not to be constructed by a speculating company, but by the hard-working yeomanry of the country. We are an industrious people, and if we can, are determined to build the road! Let gentleman understand I am no beggar. I am not begging. In granting this land, the Government is not injured, but in my judgment greatly advantaged.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I understand the gentleman to say that the stockholders do not want this land for speculation, but merely to aid in the construction of the road. Will the gentleman agree to the introduction into his bill of an amendment of this kind:

Provided, That to the amount of the net proceeds of the sales of all the lands hereby granted, stock shall be issued to the Secretary of the Treasury in trust for the Government of the United States, so that the land shall not go to private stockholders, but to the donor of the land.

[A message was here received from the Senate by ASBURY DICKIN, Esq., its Secretary, notifying the House of the passage by that body of certain bills.]

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. It would be an insult to the Government to offer such a proposition.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman did not suppose that I intended to insult the stockholders.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. The Government—

Mr. STEVENS. If the sensibility of the Government is affected, that is another matter. [Laughter.]

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. This road would afford a great advantage to the Government in the transmission of the great Southern mail, which must necessarily pass over this road from New Orleans to New York.

Mr. COBB. I would rather decline saying anything in relation to the odious feature of these bills to which the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. Snow] alluded, that is, increasing the price of the reserved sections of public lands to $2 50 per acre. I am, and always have been, opposed to that feature being inserted in the railroad bills in my section of the country. We propose by these bills to carry troops and munitions of war upon these roads for the General Government, and for the transportation of what the Government may choose to send free of charge, except the mail. I hold that this would be a sufficient equivalent for all we get from the General Government in the State of Alabama, for we, by our own private enterprise, bring thousands of acres of poor land into market, which otherwise would never have been sold. As a demonstration of that fact, I am informed by the engineer of the Mobile and Chicago Railroad that this road runs through Alabama about sixty-six miles before it reaches the city of Mobile. Lands which have been entered along the line of that road for $1 25 per acre before the road was chartered, have been sold since for upwards of twenty dollars per acre. Every solitary foot of land through that whole pine country would not bring $1 25 per acre, even within six miles of Mobile, until that road was chartered, but now persons are anxious to take it up at $2 50. In the committee, I voted against the feature in the bill increasing the price of the reserved sections of land. I voted against it because I considered it an odious feature; and it is one which I will always oppose. I hold that the lands in Alabama are too high now, and my policy is to reduce them in price so that the Government may sell out those lands, so long in market but remaining unsold.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia. I desire to state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Stevens] that the persons interested in this road—the stockholders wishing to construct it—would not be willing that stock should be issued to the Government of the value of the land which would be donated by the Government. And why would they not be willing? The public lands which remain unsold, and which will be appropriated by this bill, have been in market for many years; and I know, from my own personal observation and experience, that they are nearly worthless except for the timber. The Government now, by granting these lands to this railroad, will enable it to appropriate the timber. Take the right of way, and whatever value the building of this road may add to these alternate sections, and the Government will receive the benefit in the increased value of those sections. The mode of granting these alternate sections is not a gratuity at all. The Government, by making such grants, not only increases the value of the lands granted, but the value of their reserved sections, perhaps not to the extent of $2 50 per acre. In addition to that, this is not a voluntary grant, for the company here stipulates with the Government to transmit the troops, the public stores, and the mail of the United States, under such a contract and such regulations as shall be agreed upon by the parties and the Government. It is a grant, then, for a valuable consideration. Here are lands lying now without sale, and there is no one ready to purchase them.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Suppose, instead of giving land to build this road, the Government should think it worth while to make a road, which would increase the value of the lands, and pay for it in money, in conjunction with the assistance of Alabama, would they be entitled to stock, like the other stockholders, or must they give it to enrich those stockholders, because it would aid in disposing of the lands?

Mr. JOHNSON. That embraces a constitutional question, not of policy and propriety. It is now distinctly a question of propriety.

Mr. STEVENS. I cannot see the distinction. I have looked at both platforms, and I can see no difference. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON. I shall not attempt now to draw the distinction. That is a question I do not wish to discuss at this time. I contend that the Government has a right to dispose of the lands. Here is a conveyance for value. In addition to that, these individuals, by their property and labor, render the property of the Government more valuable by thus stipulating to do such things for the Government, as carrying the munitions of war, stores, and the mail of the United States, free of charge. This road is a link which connects the cities upon the Gulf and the Eastern cities. Every gentleman here upon this floor who represents Eastern interests, from Savannah to New York, is interested in the construction of this road. It is strictly a national road, one in which the whole country is interested. If there is a road which has been presented to this House deserving their favorable consideration, this is one.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. I will not detain the House longer upon this subject. I wish the question decided, and I hope there will not be a dissenting voice in the House in regard to this bill. I therefore call the previous question upon the bill.

Mr. CABLE, of Ohio. Is it in order to move to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I would suggest to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ABERCROMBIE] to recommit the bill, in order to keep the bill before the House.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. I will accept the suggestion, make the motion to recommit, and demand the previous question.

Mr. LETCHER. Is it in order to move to lay the bill upon the table?

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

Mr. LETCHER. Then I submit that motion.

Mr. CLINGMAN. It wants but two or three minutes of the expiration of the morning hour. I hope there will be no objection to our going into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. It can only be done by unanimous consent.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. OLDS. I wish to say to the House, that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads is next to be called, as I understand that this is the last report from the Committee on Public Lands. I propose, when the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads is called, to put the postage bill upon its passage. I have a number of amendments—

Mr. AVERETT. I rise to a question of order—

Mr. OLDS. I wish to submit these amendments, in order that they may be printed.

Mr. AVERETT. I wish to raise the question of order, and to bring the House to order. I understand that reports from the Committee on Public Lands are in order.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is a privileged one. It is to lay the railroad bill upon the table.

Mr. McMULLIN. I desire to know if a motion to commit the bill will take precedence of a motion to lay upon the table?

The SPEAKER. It will not at present.

Mr. McMULLIN. I will submit that motion at the proper time.

The SPEAKER. The proposition is not debatable.

Mr. McMULLIN. I desire to ask my colleague [Mr. LETCHER] to withdraw the motion to lay upon the table with a view that I may submit the motion to commit.

The SPEAKER. If that motion was withdrawn, the demand for the previous question would exclude the motion to commit.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I understood the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ABERCROMBIE] to move to recommit the bill before he called for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman did move to recommit the bill, and then demanded the previous question. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] then moved to lay the bill upon the table, and that is the proposition now before the House.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. EVANS asked for tellers upon the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The House was then counted, (Messrs. CHAND-LER and PENN acting as tellers,) and there were— yeas 51, noes 34.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will it be in order to move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to give notice to the House that I intend, after we come out of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to move a resolution proposing to close the debate upon the deficiency bill at one o'clock on Monday. I now move to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

THE CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. NABERS. I have a privileged motion to make, and that is to reconsider the vote by which the resolution in reference to the Pennsylvania election case was laid upon the table yesterday.

Mr. BOCK. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know if the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. NABERS] voted with the majority?

Mr. NABERS. I did.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask that my motion may be put, and that this matter may be passed over informally.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion, that if insisted upon by any member on this floor, the motion to reconsider is first in order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Suppose we proceed to the reconsideration. It is not debatable, and will it not be in order, pending that consideration, to move to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union? The rule says it may be done at any time. We are not precluded, I assume, from making the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, when a question of reconsideration is pending, that motion having been made, and no gentleman having the floor; nor can any gentleman make a speech upon it, it not being a debatable question.

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair, it is a question purely of priority. Both are privileged motions. The Chair thinks, and has so decided before, that the motion made by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. NABERS] is of a higher grade, affecting the right of a member upon this floor. The decision of the Chair is, that it takes precedence of the proposition to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. JONES. Would not another motion to go into the Committee of the Whole take precedence of that?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it is not competent for the House to postpone the consideration of the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi, if it is insisted upon.

Mr. NABERS. I shall not insist upon it. I can make the motion again this evening, I presume?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman withdraw the motion to reconsider?

Mr. NABERS. I do, sir.

Mr. HOUSTON. I insist upon my motion now.

The question was then taken upon Mr. Houston's motion, and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. STUART in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated, as the first business in order before the committee, the consideration of House bill No. 207, to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1852, upon which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TOOMBS] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. TOOMBS addressed the Committee an hour upon the subject of the Democratic and Whig nominees for the Presidency. He referred to the political history of Messrs. Pierce and King, the Democratic nominees, and showed that they had always proved steadfast friends to the constitutional rights of the South. On the other hand, the Whig nominee for the Presidency, General Scott, although he had accepted the nomination, with the resolutions annexed, had no civil antecedents upon which the South could rely; nor was there anything in the circumstances which brought about his nomination calculated to inspire confidence. He had not in his letter of acceptance indorsed the compromise. Mr. T. concluded by expressing his determination not to support him for the Presidency. [See the speech in the Appendix.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE next obtained the floor, and addressed the committee upon the subject of the ocean mail steamers, and in opposition to the payment out of the Federal Treasury of the moneys of the people to keep up private enterprises. [His speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. HOWARD here obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, who moved that the committee rise; which motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 207, being the deficiency bill, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have a resolution I desire to offer.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I have a privileged question, which I wish to bring before the House. It is late in the session, and we have spent a great deal of time unnecessarily, yet I think there is a respect due, through us, the representatives of the people, to our great national anniversary, and as it comes to-morrow, Sunday, Monday will be celebrated as that day. I therefore move that when this House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next.

[Cries, "Agreed!" "Agreed!"]

Mr. HUNTER. I hope not. The fourth of July is to-morrow, and it will be passed.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think it is evident there is not a quorum here. I do not want to object to the gentleman's resolution. I desire my resolution to be read, and I should like the House to agree to it, before it acts upon the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee. [Mr. JONES.]

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. JONES, and it was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. The resolution I desire to offer, is to make special orders of the appropriation bills, leaving out the morning hour, and also Fridays and Saturdays.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. There is no necessity for such a resolution. The appropriation bills take precedence now, when there are no special orders.

Mr. HOUSTON. But if they are made the special order, they will command more particularly the attention of the House.

Objection was made, and the resolution was not received.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I wish to offer a resolution which I send to the Clerk's table.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object to it.

Mr. FOWLER. I move that the House adjourn.

The question was then taken on the motion to adjourn, and there were, upon a division—ayes 31, noes 61.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. There is no quorum, and I move the House adjourn.

Mr. NABERS. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his motion for the purpose of explanation.

Mr. STEPHENS. I withdraw my motion.

THE CONTESTED ELECTION AGAIN.

Mr. NABERS. I desire to make a remark, to explain a motion I made this morning. It will be remembered that I made a motion this morning to reconsider the vote by which the Pennsylvania contested-election case was laid upon the table. I was induced to make that motion out of courtesy to some gentlemen upon this floor, and not because I was in favor of it. After further consultation, I understand it is desired that the motion should not be made. I therefore will not renew it.

Mr. STEPHENS. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman withdraw his motion for a moment?

Mr. STEPHENS. I will.

Mr. MARSHALL. There is a bill which has come from the Senate, and which lies upon the Speaker's table. It will not take this House any time to pass it. It is one which I have investigated. It is for the relief of Mr. Benjamin S. Roberts. The object of the bill is to restore to Mr. Roberts, and give him the pay which would be due to him as lieutenant for several years, from the time he was driven from the Army to the time when he was restored.

Mr. TOOMBS. I object to it.

On motion by Mr. STEPHENS,

The House then adjourned till Tuesday next.

PETITIONS, &c.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, July 6, 1852.

Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the Senate, accompanied by statements of the amount paid by that Department and its several bureaus for printing, binding, and stationery, from April 1, 1849, to March 31, 1852; which was ordered to be laid on the table and printed.

Also, a report of the Secretary of State, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, in relation to the examination, promotion, classification, and compensation, of the clerks in that Department, in which the Secretary states that he is not able to agree with the other heads of Departments in the report which they have made to the Senate, and that, in his opinion, it is not expedient to establish any board for the examination of candidates, either for original appointment or for promotion. The report was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate resolutions of a public meeting, convened at Parkville, Platte county, Missouri, praying the enactment of a law by Congress providing for the organization of the Territory of Nebraska, and for the immediate settlement of the lands therein from which the Indian title has been extinguished; which were referred to the Committee on the Territories.

Mr. WALKER presented a petition of the Working Man's League, of Milwaukee, Wisconsin; and a petition of citizens of Pope county, Illinois, praying that the bill now pending before Congress, commonly known as the "homestead bill," may become a law; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, an extract from the proceedings of the Board of Health of Washington City, D. C., in relation to the alanthus or "tree of Heaven," condemning it as a nuisance on account of its offensive odor when in flower, and declaring that the proposition before Congress to have it removed from the public grounds is regarded with great favor by this Board; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings.

Mr. WELLER presented the memorial of George H. Derby, a second lieutenant of the Corps of Topographical Engineers, praying that a sum of money belonging to the United States, stolen from him while in the discharge of his duty, may be allowed in the settlement of his accounts; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HAMLIN presented a memorial, very numerous signed by citizens of North Newburg, Maine, in favor of the passage of the bill now before Congress commonly known as the "homestead bill," which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HAMLIN desired to say that he pursued the same course with regard to this petition that he did to all others. He did not desire to be considered as favorable to the object of a petition by presenting it.

Mr. PRATT presented a resolution of the Legislature of Maryland, in favor of the enactment of a law granting compensation to the heirs of Baron De Kalb, for his services during the revolutionary war; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. GWIN presented the petition of Jean Deplaigne, a French subject resident in Mexico, praying indemnity for the loss of certain property seized by the naval force of the United States after the surrender of Frontera de Tabasco; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, presented a petition of Peter McNortey and others, praying that the bill now pending before Congress, commonly known as the "homestead bill," may become a law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PETITION WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. BRODHEAD, it was Ordered, That the petition of Abner Hancock, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. RUSK, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which was referred the petition of William Moss and Matthew Moss, praying to be allowed a higher grade of compensation for services rendered in the Post Office Department, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for their relief; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FELCH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which were referred sundry petitions from the Legislature and citizens of Florida; also a memorial from the Legislature of Alabama, in relation to school roads, reported a bill allowing exchanges of school lands, and authorizing selections for deficiencies in certain cases; which was read and passed to the second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill to authorize the school authorities in the State of Florida to make certain selections for school purposes, reported it back without amendment; which, on motion by Mr. FELCH, was ordered to be laid on the table, as this bill merely related to a special purpose, while the one above reported was general in its character.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred sundry memorials of citizens of Missouri, praying the establishment of a land office at Salem, in that State, reported a bill to create an additional land district in the State of Missouri; which was read and passed to the second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the House of Representatives to enable the Legislature of the State of Indiana to dispose of the unsold saline lands in said State, reported back the same without amendment; and said that as this bill merely removed the present restriction, putting the State of Indiana on an equal footing with other States in that respect, and authorizing the sale of these lands at $1 25 per acre, he supposed there would be no opposition to it, and asked its immediate consideration.

It was considered accordingly by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and no amendment being made, it was read a third time and passed.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the petition of William Stone, praying to be allowed to locate certain lands, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the memorial of the legal representatives of John G. Mackall, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of John G. Mackall, deceased; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the petition of the legal representatives of Dr. William Somerville, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the petition of Samuel S. Marcy, and the petition of Elizabeth Parsons, submitted adverse reports thereon; which were ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the petition of Mira M. Alexander, and the petition of the Oneida Indians, praying that certain allowances may be made to them, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. PRATT also submitted reports on the above petitions; which were ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives was received by Mr. FORNEY, its Clerk, announcing that it had passed the following bills:

An act to establish additional land districts in the State of Wisconsin; and

An act to amend an act entitled "An act for the discontinuance of the office of surveyor general in the several districts so soon as the surveys therein can be completed, for abolishing land offices under certain circumstances, and for other purposes."

The above-named bills were severally read a first and second time by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. CLEMENS gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a joint resolution to provide for the election of a public printer, and fixing the prices at which the work shall be done.

THE CUBAN EXPEDITION.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. FILLMORE, his Secretary, recommending that provision be made by Congress to compensate the consul of the United States for expenses incurred in the outfit and transportation to the United States of certain foreigners engaged in the Cuban expedition; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

MEXICAN BOUNDARY COMMISSIONER.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. WELLER on the 28th June, in relation to certain charges preferred against J. R. Bartlett, commissioner for running the Mexican boundary, as follows:

Resolved, That the charges preferred by Colonel J. McClellan, of the Topographical Corps, and others, against J. R. Bartlett, appointed Commissioner to run and mark the boundary line between the United States and the Republic of Mexico, be referred to a select committee of five for investigation, with power, if necessary, to send for persons and papers."

Mr. WELLER addressed the Senate at considerable length in defense of his conduct while Commissioner to run the Mexican boundary. [His speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. President, I do not feel disposed, at this late hour, to attempt to go into the question, which has been so ably and so fully argued by the honorable Senator from California, [Mr. WELLER.] With very much of the remarks of the Senator, I certainly have no connection whatever. I am not "my brother's keeper." So far as regards the injury which the honorable Senator has received, or supposes he has received, from a distinguished gentleman, who is no longer a member of this body, I have nothing to do with it. I have heard his explanation, and his justification; and I have not one word to say against it. I simply rise now to say, that I stand here to defend, so far as the limited means in my possession will enable me to defend, the character of the present Commissioner upon the Mexican boundary commission. As was well observed by the honorable Senator from California, the means within our power are yet incomplete, and wholly insufficient to allow us to judge the question, whether the present Commissioner has performed his duties, under the orders which he has received, and put a proper construction on the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo; or whether he has, from any insufficiency of power, or from any corrupt motive, departed from that treaty, or departed from the position which he should occupy as a high functionary of the Government of the United States. This is a question that I have not yet the means fully in my power to ascertain or determine. I am not, therefore, at this moment, prepared to go into that defense as fully as I intend. Hence I rose to ask that this resolution be postponed to some future, and no very distant day. I have in my possession some papers which relate to the subject. I have other papers at home, which reached me during the interim between the last session of Congress and the present one, for which I shall be obliged to send, or go and get them, in order to make what feeble justification I can for the present Commissioner, before the expected documents are received from the Department of the Interior. I would observe here, that some six weeks since I called at the Department of the Interior, and was told that within a week all the papers relating to that boundary commission, which were to be sent in upon the call of the honorable Senator from California, would be here. They have not yet reached us. When they do reach us, it will be too late to have them printed in season for us to use them at this session of Congress. I therefore now desire to ask, that, in case they come in while I am out of my place, they may not be ordered to be printed, in order that the manuscript may be here for our inspection before any other action may be taken.

I move now that the further consideration of this resolution be postponed until Thursday. At that time I hope I shall be prepared to throw as much light upon the subject as the limited means within my power will enable me to do. But I venture now to say, in anticipation—and I feel bound to say in justification of the present Commissioner—that the limited means within my reach will, I think, enable me entirely to exculpate him from the charges which have been made against him, not by the honorable Senator from California, but by others; and I trust that all the documents, when they appear, will show him forth before the country clear, unstained, and unblamable.

Mr. WELLER. If it would suit the convenience of the Senator from Rhode Island, I would prefer to have the resolution postponed for a longer period than Thursday. I shall then be necessarily absent. I should, of course, desire to be here when the honorable Senator defends the action of the present Commissioner.

Mr. CLARKE. Will the Senator have the goodness to name his own day—any day which will suit him?

Mr. WELLER. Say Thursday week.

Mr. CLARKE. Then, in accordance with the suggestion of the honorable Senator, I move to postpone the further consideration of the resolution until Thursday week next. I would, however, state, that if he should not be present on the day which I propose, I should feel bound not to go on in his absence.

Mr. RUSK. I have no objection, sir, to the postponement of the resolution before the Senate until Thursday week. Inasmuch, however, as a postponement of it, in connection with what has been said in regard to the papers which we expect to receive from the Secretary of the Interior in answer to another call, might carry the idea that that subject is to be postponed and passed over, I simply rise to say that I shall not agree to any such understanding. I do not care anything about the charges preferred against the Commissioner; but I see by a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, that the initial point on the Rio Grande established by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, has been departed from—palpably and clearly departed from—to the damage of the United States, and in favor of Mexico, for some thirty or thirty-five miles. With regard to that point, it is my purpose at all times, and at all places, whenever and wherever I can, to avoid the consummation of the new line not included in the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. And, when the papers come in, if they bear upon that point—as I apprehend they will, and I have been only waiting for them upon that ground—I shall desire that those papers be printed at once. When the deficiency bill was under consideration, I voted for an appropriation to supply a deficiency for this boundary commission, with a condition. I have examined this matter with regard to the departure of the line fixed by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, and in regard to that question there can be no doubt. I do not intend to vote another dollar to this boundary commission—so far from it, I mean to resist the appropriation of any more money until we have some assurance that the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, and not the negotiations between the Commissioners, is to settle the initial point of the line upon the Rio Grande.

Mr. CLARKE. I certainly did not anticipate the objection made by the Senator from Texas, [Mr. RUSK,] and how far that objection may go I am hardly able to say. The means are not in my possession from which I can judge what were the initial points agreed on by the Commissioners of the two countries on the Rio Grande, under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. Until these documents come from the Department of the Interior, I am unable—what information may be in the possession of the Senator from Texas I do not know—to form any opinion as to the propriety or impropriety of the initial points agreed upon.

I hold in my hand a letter addressed to me by the American Commissioner himself, dated from "El Paso del Norte, 27th December, 1850," and in that letter he states that he has come to an agreement with the Mexican Commissioner on the line to be run for the southern boundary of New Mexico; and he states distinctly, plainly, clearly, and unequivocally—and that statement must be true or false—that he has been governed by the provisions of the fifth article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, and that he has been governed by the map of Disturnell, published in 1847, which was referred to in that treaty; and although he states that that map, in itself, is manifestly incorrect, still he has secured for the United States a large quantity of land which it was feared would be lost, together with the rich and valuable gold and copper mines of New Mexico.

Now, sir, this manner of casting imputations in advance upon any public officer, I will simply say does not meet my approbation. If, upon the inspection of these papers—as I have once before said in this body—the Commissioner shall be found to have been derelict in his duty, either from ignorance or corruption, let him be condemned. But, sir, while he is absent, in the wilderness or the desert, being permitted to enjoy probably, as his only luxury, the privilege of bathing now and then in the muddy and turbid waters of the Gila, I protest most sincerely against his being arraigned in this body, that he may be condemned by the American people undefended, and without the means of defense within the reach of his friends. Let the whole correspondence be presented, and the maps to which a reference is made. In that correspondence he says, "I am preparing two maps of the line fixed by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, to which I call your attention; the one, of the line claimed by the Mexican Commissioner, and the other, the line secured by me." Let these maps come in, and let all the information be before the Senate, so that the Senate and the country may know what has been done, and whether this Commissioner has yielded up or given away—as he has been charged with doing—a large quantity of beautiful land, the first of that description ever heard of in that country. For it has been said that he has yielded up some twenty-two minutes of latitude—about twenty-five miles—and has thus inflicted a loss upon the country. If that be true, let him be condemned. But I beg to suggest, in extenuation at least, if not in defense of the Commissioner, that the Administration itself—not that under which he was appointed, but the succeeding Administration—have approved his acts. His conduct has been satisfactory to them. He was appointed by the administration of the late lamented General Taylor, and he continued to hold his appointment under the administration of Mr. Fillmore. He received his orders as Commissioner from the then Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Ewing; and he has since received orders and his confirmation and justification, from the present Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Stuart. Now, let me say that this bespeaks for the individual at least so much as this, that public opinion should be suspended until the evidence is clear and decisive that he has been guilty of dereliction of duty. I do not ask that any portion of this correspondence, or any portion of the communication that is expected from the Department of the Interior should be suppressed.

I would most cheerfully give my vote for its speedy publication, if it could be laid on the table this moment, and thus enable us to see it and know what it contains; but it is very voluminous, and my only object in making the previous remarks on this subject was to call the attention of the Senate to the fact, that inasmuch as it is impossible for the publication of this communication from the Department to be made this session, it would be better to withhold it until the Senator from Texas, [Mr. Rusk,] together with the Senator from California, [Mr. Weller,] and myself might have an opportunity of personally examining the manuscript. If it goes into the hands of the printer we shall see nothing more of it for a long, long day; and I am desirous of seeing it, and of ascertaining whether this Commissioner, in whom I have the utmost faith as a man of integrity and talent, has been guilty of such a dereliction from duty as should subject him to the censure which has been inflicted on him.

I shall be ready on the day designated, if the communication should in the interim come in from the Department, to go into an examination of the question. I expect to be fully capable of vindicating that officer; but if he cannot be sustained by the record and by the facts, I shall unite with my friend from Texas [Mr. Rusk] in pronouncing his condemnation. I sustain him alone on his merits, though I know that he has been the object of great vituperation and abuse. It was the worst-formed commission that ever departed from a country with any object in view that lies within the object of civilized men.

Sir, when this matter again comes up for discussion, I shall be obliged to say things that I shall exceedingly regret. Gentlemen who have made these charges must expect that there will be a reaction. I know not one of them. None of them has ever come within the range of my vision. I certainly have not the honor of their acquaintance; but when this investigation is made, mark me! there will be a reaction on the heads of those who have made these charges against this Commissioner, that shall consign them to the deepest infamy to which men can be consigned.

I have done now for the present. I think the suggestion made by my friend from Texas should be agreed to. I desire no delay in the publication of these documents; but if they cannot be published at an early day, I desire that he and I should have an opportunity of examining the manuscript, so that when the day arrives for the further discussion of this question, we shall be able to go into it fairly and impartially.

Mr. RUSK. I have nothing to say against the Commissioner personally. I trust he will be able to defend himself; but I do not mean, if I can help it, to lose the land. The territory, as far down as El Paso, by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, belongs to the United States. I propose, whenever we can get at the subject, to show that so plainly, that he who runs may read. There can be no sort of excuse for departing from the map of Disturnell, and giving away some five or six thousand square miles. I do not know who is to blame in the matter, nor do I care—whether the Commissioner or the Secretary of the Interior; but that is the point to which I wish to direct my inquiries—I mean in relation to the territory. It is not for the purpose of making any lodgment in the public mind for or against any particular officer. There have been some officers with whom I have had correspondence, who I think the Senator from Rhode Island will find great difficulty in consigning to that place to which he would consign every person who comes into collision with the Commissioner.

Mr. CLARKE. The Senator from Texas mistakes me; I made use of no such expression.

Mr. RUSK. I certainly so understood the honorable Senator.

Mr. CLARKE. I did not mean to be so understood at any rate.

Mr. RUSK. I am glad to hear it. The surveyor attached to the commission protested against a departure from the treaty in the establishment of the initial point, and was dismissed. An officer of the Army, of very high standing, (Colonel Graham,) who made an enviable reputation on a far more difficult boundary than this, has also been superseded. If, when the papers come in, it shall appear they were superseded because they would not agree to the new line, they shall find a defender in me to the extent of my ability.

I desire to say that I have no enmity against any one—none at all. I shall not pursue the investigation with any view of finding anything against any one, but simply with the desire to sustain the provisions of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, and to avoid surrendering that territory to Mexico which properly belongs to us, which is ours by right, and which we should not surrender.

The question was then taken on the motion to postpone the further consideration of the resolution till Thursday, the 15th instant, and it was decided in the affirmative.

L. M. GOLDSBOROUGH.

Mr. GWIN. I move to postpone the prior orders, for the purpose of taking up Senate bill No. 274. It is a bill for the relief of L. M. Goldsborough, G. J. Van Brunt, and S. F. Blunt.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read a second time, and considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department be authorized and required to allow and pay to L. M. Goldsborough, G. J. Van Brunt, and S. F. Blunt, for expenses incurred by them, respectively, while serving upon a joint commission of Army and Navy officers in California and Oregon, during the years 1849 and 1850, double the pay of a commander in the Navy, in sea service, during the exact time of their employment on said coasts as aforesaid, to wit: from the first of April, 1849, to the 27th of November, 1850, deducting therefrom the regular pay accruing to said officers during that period.

Mr. GWIN. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report of the Committee on Naval Affairs was accordingly read, from which it appeared that in November, 1848, the memorialists were ordered by the Navy Department to proceed to California, as the naval members of a joint commission of Army and Navy officers, instituted by the authority of the President of the United States, to explore the countries of California and Oregon, and report upon certain military, naval, and other subjects connected therewith; that, as well in traveling to, as on reaching, the scenes of their labors, and during the whole period they were employed on this service, being about two years, they found to exist the most extraordinary condition of things, especially in relation to the prices of labor, and of all kinds of articles of common and absolute necessity; that they were not attached to any vessel of the Navy while engaged in their duties in California and Oregon; and that, although they were conveyed from place to place by a Government propeller, yet their duties were on shore, and required them to be there—at one period for several months uninterruptedly. The memorialists further represent, that in consequence of the peculiar circumstances referred to, their ordinary pay was wholly inadequate for their support, and beyond that pay no allowance whatever, for extra expenses of any sort, has ever been made to them, or can be made without the authority of Congress.

The committee report that they are satisfied of the correctness of the statements made by the memorialists, and that their pay was insufficient to enable them to meet the additional expenses they were necessarily compelled to incur during the discharge of their official duties, and they believe that the relief asked for in their case is not only just and proper, but sanctioned by precedent.

Mr. DAVIS. I would inquire how much is the pay of a commander?

Mr. GWIN. The pay of a commander, including all expenses, is $2,500.

Mr. PRATT. This bill gives them $5,000.

Mr. GWIN. I will state that these gentlemen were engaged in this service at a time when the expenses of living in that country were greater than they have been at any other time. It will be recollected that the pay of the appraiser of customs in California, is by law $6,000; and that the pay of a naval officer is $8,000, and of a surveyor, $7,000. These officers were engaged in a very important service, and I am perfectly confident that they will not, with the proposed compensation, more than meet the expenses incurred by them. I have a knowledge of the facts in this case, and I think the bill ought to be passed.

Mr. BORLAND. I would inquire if this bill proposes to give any addition to pay to which they are lawfully entitled, or whether it is to repay expenses incurred while in the performance of duty?

Mr. GWIN. It is to reimburse them for expenses incurred over and above the pay they received. One of them, as I know, has been much embarrassed in consequence of that expense.

Mr. BORLAND. I would inquire if that is not the case with regard to some Army officers who were appointed with the same Navy officers? If so, would it not be proper to include them also?

Mr. GWIN. There are general propositions to pay for all the expenses. The officers of the Army in California have been provided for by a former bill; but these officers were employed for a specific duty, commencing on a particular day and ending at a particular time. It is a special case, not provided for by the general law. The Naval Committee has reported a bill for meeting the expenses of the officers of the Navy as those of officers of the Army have been met heretofore.

Mr. BORLAND. By giving double pay?

Mr. GWIN. Yes, sir, by doubling the pay.

Mr. DAVIS. It seems to me to be reasonable that some provision should be made for the officers of the Army, sufficient to meet the difficulty here suggested. The only difficulty I have in this special legislation is, that there are a great many persons in precisely the same predicament. These gentlemen now say that they performed services on the land. So does every officer of the Army; but I do not know that they are subject to larger expenses on that account than others who are in the service of the country generally. The only difficulty that I have in this case is, that I do not see exactly the principle on which this allowance is proposed to be made. These gentlemen, in the performance of their duty, have incurred certain expenses. I have no objection to indemnify them, if I can see that that is met and that there is nothing else coming. If we were to establish a rule which we could apply to other applicants, and carry it out, I should not be indisposed to support this bill; but the doubling of the pay does not seem to me to constitute a rule by which to treat parties when they come here. It may, in this case, be just, but the simple fact of doubling the pay does not show it. I dare say the committee have some fact to show that they were dealing equitably with those gentlemen, and I should be glad to do the same thing.

Mr. GWIN. These gentlemen were employed in a special service, and therefore a special bill was reported. The Committee on Naval Affairs have reported a general bill to meet the expenses of officers engaged in service on that coast. A similar bill was passed granting two years' extra pay to officers in the Army in California, which expired on the 3d of March last, and I have received a letter from the commander on the Pacific coast, stating that soldiers are deserting since the pay has been lessened. This bill has reference to officers engaged in a specific duty. They were ordered to California in 1848, and to Oregon, to select sites for navy-yards and fortifications. The memorial of these gentlemen was sent to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and we provided for them, as has been done in other cases; but this being a specific duty, commencing on a certain day and closing on a certain day, it was brought forward in its present shape.

Mr. PRATT. I would inquire of the Senator from California whether the general bill to be introduced by the Committee on Naval Affairs doubles the pay, prospectively, of officers engaged on the Pacific coast?

Mr. GWIN. It does, for a specified time.

Mr. PRATT. As I understand the Senator, it doubles the pay of officers who may go there in future?

Mr. GWIN. Yes.

Mr. PRATT. Then I shall vote for this bill with great pleasure. I do not think there is any reasonable ground of objection in the idea started, that this is a special bill, because these gentlemen have gone to California, and performed specific services, for which they should be compensated. This is only a case of special legislation to provide for a special service; and, as such, I shall vote for it.

Mr. SHIELDS. I am just come in from a meeting of the Committee on Military Affairs, and learn that the bill now before the Senate is for the relief of L. M. Goldsborough and others. I have received a letter from some officers of the Army, who, as I understand, were engaged on the same business with these gentlemen; and I presume that they are, therefore, entitled to this compensation. I am not acquainted with the facts of the case, but merely take the statement presented by these officers.

I see that this bill was reported by the Senator from California, [Mr. GWIN,] who, I dare say, is better acquainted with the facts than I am, and, I presume, will have no objection to include these officers of the Army in the measure of relief. I merely want to put them all on the same footing.

I have no objection to the bill as it is, but would ask to amend it by adding the following section:

And be it further enacted, That each of the three Army officers, J. L. Smith, C. A. Ogden, and D. Leadbetter, of the Corps of Engineers, who were associated with the said Navy officers in the joint duty aforesaid, be allowed by law, and paid, as aforesaid, commutation of fare and quarters from the 1st of April, 1849, to the 27th of November, 1850, equal in amount to the allowance authorized to a major of the Army, on duty at San Francisco during that time—deducting therefrom the commutation to which they would have been entitled, respectively, at their posts in the Atlantic States.

Mr. GWIN. It is perfectly right that that amendment should be adopted. The subject was referred to the Naval Committee, and I know that these officers should be provided for in the manner which is proposed.

Mr. BORLAND. The proposed amendment meets the case which I suggested just now. I was aware of the claim of these officers, and of the amount to which they deemed themselves entitled, and I desired that they might be provided for in the same manner as those for which the bill provides.

The amendment was then agreed to.

The bill was then reported to the Senate as amended, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

RICHARD FITZPATRICK.

Mr. MALLORY. I move to postpone all prior orders, with the view of taking up Senate bill No. 431, which is a bill for the relief of Richard Fitzpatrick. It is a very meritorious case, and will not involve any discussion.

The motion to postpone the prior orders was agreed to; and the bill was read a second time, and considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be authorized and required to settle and adjust the claim of Richard Fitzpatrick, for the use and occupation of his land on the Miami and New rivers, in Florida, during the Seminole hostilities, as a military post, by order of officers of the United States, and for wood cut on said lands for the use of the military or naval forces, and for any other property taken and used by order of officers in command at those places for public purposes or defense, and that the amount so found due, upon competent evidence, be paid out of any unappropriated money in the Treasury; but that nothing contained in the bill shall be construed to authorize payment for property destroyed by the Indians.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

STATE UNIVERSITY OF INDIANA.

Mr. BRIGHT. I ask the consent of the Senate to postpone the prior orders, for the purpose of taking up House bill No. 239, which is "An act to supply a deficiency to the State of Indiana, in 'a township of land granted to said State for the use of a State university, by an act of Congress approved 19th of April, 1816.'

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that there be supplied to the State of Indiana for the sole and exclusive use of the State university, an equal number of acres of land found to be deficient in the original grant, and which has been otherwise appropriated by Congress, amounting to four thousand one hundred and sixty-six acres; and that said lands be selected under the direction of the Governor of the State from any lands now in market in said State belonging to the United States, the proceeds of which shall be appropriated solely to the use of said State university, and shall never be diverted to any other purpose whatever.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and was read a third time and passed.

GNADENHUTTEN.

Mr. CHASE. There is a bill from the House of Representatives, which I desire the indulgence of the Senate to take up. It relates to a matter of considerable importance to the town concerned, and of very little consequence to the country. It is "An act in relation to a certain lot of land in the town of Gnadenhutzen, in the State of Ohio." The whole object of the bill is to allow the town to appropriate for other public purposes a square of ground, originally appropriated as a market square. It having become unimportant for that purpose, it is desirable that it may be appropriated to some other use.

The motion to take up the bill was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to its consideration, as in Committee of the Whole. It provides, that the lot of land, in the town of Gnadenhutzen, in the county of Tuscarawas, in the State of Ohio, heretofore reserved, under the act entitled "An act providing for the disposition of three several tracts of land in Tuscarawas county, in the State of Ohio, and for other purposes," approved May 26, 1824, for the purpose of a market square, may be used for any other public purpose, upon such terms as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, in order to secure the rights of all parties interested therein.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and read a third time and passed.

MARY A. DAVIS.

On motion by Mr. BRODHEAD, the Senate took up a bill for the relief of Mrs. Mary A. Davis. The bill was read a second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

And then, on motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, July 6, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. L. F. MORGAN.

The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

RIGHT OF WAY TO RAIL AND PLANK ROADS.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the consideration of a bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands granting the right of way to rail and plank roads passing through public lands.

Mr. COBB. My object in proposing, a week ago, to postpone the consideration of this bill until to-day, was to have it printed so that every member might have it before him. I understand that the bill has not been printed, or at any rate it has not been received. If it be the pleasure of the House, I will move to postpone its consideration one week longer.

[Cries of "Agreed!" "Agreed!"]

The question was put, and the motion was agreed to.

HOOR OF MEETING.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask the consent of the House to offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's table.

The resolution was read for information, as follows:

Resolved, That until otherwise ordered, the daily hour of meeting of the House shall be eleven o'clock, a. m.

No objection being made, the resolution was introduced and adopted.

INDIANA CENTRAL RAILROAD.

Mr. HENDRICKS, by unanimous consent, introduced "A bill for the relief of the Indiana Central Railroad Company;" which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

PER DIEM AND MILEAGE TO H. B. WRIGHT.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move the adoption of the resolution I send to the table. If there be any objection, I shall move to suspend the rules to introduce it.

[Voices. "You can't do that!" "This is not Monday!" "Yesterday was Monday, and fourth of July!"]

Mr. RICHARDSON. I take back that notice, then. [Laughter.]

The resolution was then read for information, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House pay out of the contingent fund of the House to Hendrick B. Wright the same compensation per diem and mileage that is allowed to members of Congress, computing the per diem from the commencement of the present session of the present Congress to the second day of July inclusive.

Mr. JOHN W. HOWE. I object to its introduction.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection to its introduction, and let us take a vote of the House upon it. It will ultimately be granted, and I think it ought to be. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection and let us act upon it now, and save any further consumption of time upon it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I rise to say that I shall propose an amendment to that resolution, including a similar payment to Mr. Littell, the contestant from the fourth district, and to Mr. Ingersoll, contestant from the third district of Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is objected to, and it cannot be received.

DEFICIENCY BILL—CLOSE OF DEBATE.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to offer a resolution proposing to terminate debate on the deficiency bill, No. 207, at twelve o'clock to-morrow, so that the House may consume the whole day upon it.

The resolution was read for information, as follows:

Resolved, That all debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the bill of the House No. 207, to supply deficiencies in the appropriation for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1852, shall cease at twelve o'clock on Wednesday, the 7th of July, if the committee shall not come sooner to a conclusion upon the same, and the committee shall then proceed to vote upon the amendments pending or offered to the same, and shall then report it to the House with such amendments as may be agreed to by the committee.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon his demand for the previous question. There are important principles involved in some of the amendments, and several gentlemen wish to discuss them, and they can be discussed legitimately.

The House was then divided on seconding the demand for the previous question, and there were—ayes 67, noes not counted.

So the previous question received a second, and the main question was ordered to be put.

The question was then taken, and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

GIRARD AND MOBILE RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER. The regular business is the consideration of "A bill to grant to the State of Alabama the right of way and a portion of the public lands, to aid in the construction of a railroad from Girard to the waters of the Mobile bay, in said State."

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I trust that the consideration of that business will not be insisted upon, until I shall have had an opportunity to introduce the resolution I send to the Speaker's desk.

Mr. FOWLER. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. The bill before the House this morning for consideration in order, I trust may be passed.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been demanded.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. If the motion to recommit be not withdrawn, and the call for the previous question be seconded, will not the vote then be upon the recommitment? and if that be voted down, will not the question recur upon the passage or the engrossment of the bill?

The SPEAKER. Such will be the case.

The call for the previous question was then seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put. The question then recurred upon the motion to recommit.

Mr. STEPHENS. I will make one further inquiry of the Chair. If the motion to recommit be voted down, will not the question then recur on the engrossment of the bill?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. We have got to a good point, when we should put the bill upon the table, and I make that motion. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLISON demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was then put on the motion to lay on the table, and it was agreed to—yeas 80, nays 57; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, John Appleton, Averett, David J. Bailey, Bell, Bibbhaugh, Breckinridge, Buel, Burrows, Burt, Busby, Joseph Cable, Lewis D. Campbell, Carter, Chastain, Churchwell, Cullon, Curtis, Daniel, Dean, Dimmick, Disney, Dunham, Evans, Floyd, Fowler, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gaylord, Giddings, Gilmore, Goodenow, Green, Grow, Hamilton, Isham G. Harris, Hart, Hibbard, Holladay, Horsford, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Hunter, Ives, George W. Jones, Preston King, Kurtz, Mann, Mason, McKorkle, McNair, McQueen, Milson, Miner, Morehead, Murphy, Murray, Newton, Olds, Andrew Parker, S. W. Parker, Peasler, Perkins, Powell, Reed, Riddle, Robbins, Robie, Schoonmaker, Scudder, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Benjamin Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stephens, Stratton, Sweetser, Townshend, Wallace, and Washburn—80.

NAYS—Messrs. Abernethy, W. Allen, Bissell, Bowie, Bragg, Brenton, Brooks, Albert G. Brown, Caldwell, T. Campbell, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, John G. Davis, Doty, Freeman, Henry M. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, St. Martin, Stuart, Taylor, Thurston, Walbridge, Ward, Watkins, Welch, Alexander White, Wilcox, and Williams—57.

So the bill was ordered to be laid on the table.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to lie on the table, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question was put on the latter motion, and it was agreed to.

MODIFICATIONS OF THE POSTAGE LAW.

Mr. OLDS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to report back House bill No. 144, entitled "An act to amend the act entitled 'An act to reduce and modify the rates of postage in the United States, and for other purposes,' passed March 3d, 1851," with sundry amendments. I desire, before these amendments are read, to express the hope that the House will pay attention to them, as I intend this morning to move to put the bill on its passage. It is very important that it should pass as soon as possible. I asked, some time since, the unanimous consent of the House to move the printing of the amendments, so that members might have them before them, but the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] thought it would interfere with the rights of the Committee on Public Lands, and raised objection to my motion.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think it would be decidedly better if the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads would have this bill referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and printed. We all know that the present postage law was passed through the last Congress as a substitute by way of amendment to a bill passed by this House, and that it never was read when it became the law of the land. There are a whole string of amendments, and it is impossible for them all to be understood on their mere reading.

Mr. OLDS. I wish to say, with regard to that suggestion of the gentleman, this: If the bill goes to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I am satisfied it will not again be reached this session. Letters are being received by members of Congress every day from every portion of the Union demanding that some change should be made in the law with regard to newspaper postage. This bill contemplates but little beyond the simplification of postage on newspapers. These amendments have been agreed upon in a joint meeting of the Committees on the Post Office and Post Roads of the Senate and House. We have the assurance, when adopted here, the bill will speedily become a law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let us postpone the consideration of the bill to a day certain, to have it printed. We will then all be aware on what we are voting.

Mr. FOWLER. With the permission of the gentleman from Ohio, I would like to have the bill read. I am sure when it is read the simplicity of the amendments will be so evident that gentlemen will be willing to proceed to act upon it at once.

Mr. OLDS. Let the bill be read, then.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A BILL to amend the act entitled "An act to reduce and modify the rates of postage in the United States, and for other purposes," passed March 3d, 1851.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the 30th day of June, 1852, the postage upon all printed matter passing through the mail of the United States, instead of the rates now charged, shall be as follows, to wit: Each newspaper, pamphlet, periodical, magazine, book bound or unbound, circular, catalogue, and every other description of printed matter unconnected with any manuscript or writing, and of no greater weight than two and a half ounces, shall be charged with one cent postage, and one cent for each additional ounce or fraction of an ounce, for any distance under two thousand miles; and for any distance over two thousand miles, double those rates. All newspapers published regularly and sent from the office of publication to actual subscribers, not weighing over one ounce, shall be chargeable with one half the foregoing rates. The postage upon all printed mailable matter shall be prepaid either at the office where it is mailed or at the office of delivery, otherwise double the foregoing rates shall be charged thereon; all transient printed matter shall be deemed unpaid, unless paid at the office where it is mailed.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That books, bound or unbound, not weighing over four pounds, shall be deemed mailable matter, and all printed matter chargeable by weight shall be weighed when dry. The publishers of newspapers and periodicals may send to each other from their respective offices of publication, free of postage, one copy of each publication, and may also send to each actual subscriber, included in their publications, bills and receipts for the same, free of postage. The publishers of weekly newspapers may send to each actual subscriber within the county where their papers are printed and published, one copy thereof free of postage.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all laws or parts of laws incompatible with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not feel desirous of acting on that bill till it is printed, and therefore move that it be postponed and ordered to be printed.

Mr. OLDS. I would like to make an inquiry. If the amendments be printed to-morrow morning in the Globe, I should have no objection to the postponement of the bill till Thursday. There can be no excuse, to postpone for the printing of the bill, because it has been printed for many months. I do not know whether or not these amendments will be printed in the Globe, if they are not read at the Clerk's desk. If they go into the Globe, as I have already stated, I am willing the further consideration of the bill should be postponed until to-morrow or Thursday.

The SPEAKER. It is according to the practice of that paper that the proposed amendments will go into the Globe. The House cannot make any order of that kind to the paper.

Mr. OLDS. I am aware of that. I merely made the inquiry whether or no they would appear there.

The SPEAKER. The Reporter states they will appear in the Globe.

Mr. OLDS. I then have no objection to the postponement, till to-morrow or Thursday, of its further consideration.

1st amendment: Section 1. Eleventh line, strike out the words "and a half."

2d amendment: Same section. Thirteenth and fourteenth lines, strike out "two" and insert "three" in each line.

3d amendment: Same section. Fifteenth line, strike out the words "published regularly," and insert the words "and periodicals, not weighing over one ounce, published regularly as often as once in three months."

4th amendment: Same section. Sixteenth and seventeenth lines, strike out the words "and not weighing over one ounce."

5th amendment: Same section. Seventeenth line after the word "with," insert the word "only."

6th amendment: Same section. Nineteenth line, strike out the word "either."

7th amendment: Same section. Twentieth line, after the word "or," insert the words "paid quarterly in advance."

8th amendment: Same section. Twenty-first line, after the word "thereon," strike out the remainder of said section.

9th amendment: Strike out the third section.

10th amendment: Add the following additional sections:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That no newspaper, periodical, magazine, or other printed paper, or matter, shall be entitled to be sent at the rates of postage in this act specified, unless the following conditions be observed:

First, It shall be sent without any cover or wrapper, or in a cover or wrapper open at the ends or sides, so that the character of the matter contained therein may be determined without removing such wrapper.

Second, There shall be no word or communication printed on the same after its publication, or upon the cover or wrapper thereof, nor any writing or marks upon it, nor upon the cover or wrapper thereof, except the name and address of the person to whom it is to be sent.

Third, There shall be no paper or other thing inclosed in or with such printed paper; and if these conditions are not complied with, such printed matter shall be subject to letter postage; and all matter sent by mail from one part of the United States to another, the postage of which is not fixed by the provisions of this act, shall, unless the same be entitled to be sent free of postage, be charged with letter postage.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That if the publisher of any periodical, after being three months previously notified that his publication is not taken out of the office to which it is sent for delivery, continue to forward such publication in the mail, the postmaster to whose office such publication is sent may dispose of the same for the postage, unless the publisher shall pay it; and whenever any printed matter of any description, received during one quarter of the fiscal year, shall have remained in the office without being called for during the whole of any succeeding quarter, the postmaster at such office shall sell the same and credit the proceeds of such sale in his quarterly accounts, under such regulations and after such notice as the Post Office Department shall prescribe.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That so much of the second section of the act entitled "An act to modify and reduce the rates of postage in the United States and for other purposes," approved March 3d, 1851, as relates to the postage or free circulation or transmission of newspapers, periodicals, and other printed matter, and all other provisions of law inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed.

Mr. BROOKS. I ask the attention for a moment, of the ear of the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. I was about suggesting, when this bill came up for consideration, that he would state to the House the proposed change in newspaper postage, so that the information should go out to the country. It is important the proposed changes should be understood. There is a reduction of postage in some quarters, it is well enough to understand, with a great increase in other quarters of the country. What that increase is upon small newspapers for short distances, and what that decrease is upon great distances it is useful to the understanding of the House to have laid before it in some brief form, by report or otherwise.

The SPEAKER. The motion to postpone is not debatable.

Mr. BROOKS. I wish also to state that I would be happy to have the statement now, and to see it in the Globe in the morning.

Mr. OLDS. I will say to the gentleman that the report accompanying this bill states precisely the information he desires.

Mr. BROOKS. Is it a printed report?

Mr. OLDS. It is in the document room.

Mr. BROOKS. I hope the Reporters of the Globe will embody it in form unincumbered with the amendments, so that we can see it there, as it is proposed to pass it.

The report of the committee alluded to is as follows:

"From the recommendation of the Postmaster General; from the numerous petitions before your committee; and from the dissatisfaction generally manifested over the country, towards the provisions of the act of the 3d March entitled 'An act to reduce and modify the rates of postage in the United States, and for other purposes,' in relation to so much of said act as imposes the present rates of postage upon newspapers, periodicals and other printed matter; your committee have been induced to inquire into the practical operation of the law, and the causes of complaint against it.

"The committee find, First, that the present rates of postage upon newspapers, periodicals and other printed matter, are so numerous and complicated, that it is almost impossible to determine what rate should be charged, without constant reference to the table of rates. Second, that the postage on newspapers, periodicals and other printed matter for long distances, is so high as to materially limit their circulation. Third, that the enormous rate of postage charged upon transient newspapers and other printed matter, amounts nearly to a prohibition of their transmission through the mails of the United States.

"In relation to the numerous and complicated rates of postage upon newspapers, your committee find that the postage on newspapers 'to actual and bona fide subscribers,' is regulated by weight, by the number of times it sued, by the distance conveyed, and by their size not exceeding three hundred square inches. On a newspaper not exceeding three ounces in weight, according to the distance conveyed; there are six rates on a daily—six on a tri-weekly—six on a semi-weekly—six on a weekly—six on a semi-monthly, and six on a monthly; making thirty-six different rates on a newspaper not weighing over three ounces. But if any one of the above issues shall not exceed three hundred square inches by measurement, only one-fourth of the above rates are to be charged; making again six more rates upon a daily—six upon a tri-weekly—six upon a semi-weekly—six upon a weekly—six upon a semi-monthly, and six upon a monthly; thus making in all seventy-two different rates of postage upon newspapers sent to actual and bona fide subscribers, not taking into the account the different rates charged upon transient newspapers, which still further greatly complicate and increase the number of rates.

"It will be easily perceived that these complicated rates render it extremely difficult to determine what postage should be charged upon a newspaper. The postmaster, in determining this question, must ascertain the weight of the paper, the distance it is conveyed, how often it is issued, and its actual measurement, that it may not exceed three hundred square inches.

"That the present rates of postage on newspapers and other printed matter, when conveyed long distances, are so onerous as materially to limit their circulation, is also easily susceptible of elucidation. By the act of the 3d March, 1851, a daily newspaper not exceeding three ounces in weight, conveyed over two thousand miles, pays five dollars per annum postage; if the distance conveyed is over four thousand miles, the postage is six dollars per annum. In most cases, this exceeds the publisher's price of the paper; and but very few persons will be found willing to incur this enormous tax. This exorbitant rate of postage on this class of newspapers, has operated greatly to diminish their transmission through the mails.

"By the act of the 3d March, 1851, a transient newspaper, not exceeding one ounce in weight, if conveyed over five hundred miles, is charged one cent postage; if over five hundred and not exceeding fifteen hundred miles, it is charged two cents; if over fifteen hundred and not exceeding twenty-five hundred miles, the postage is three cents; if over twenty-five hundred and not exceeding thirty-five hundred miles, the charge is four cents; and if over thirty-five hundred miles the postage is five cents; and for every additional ounce in weight, or fractional part of an ounce, an additional rate of postage is charged; and then in addition to all these rates, unless the postage is paid in advance, double the above rates are to be charged. Most of the daily papers of this city, as well as the dailies of the other principal cities of the United States, exceed one ounce in weight. Papers published at the capital of the nation, containing the proceedings of Congress and the action of the Government, those published in your large commercial cities, containing commercial news and the condition of the markets, have heretofore been the mediums through which individuals have communicated much valuable information to their distant friends. But an examination of the rates of postage charged, under the provisions of the present law, will satisfy every one that in future all such information must be communicated through other channels, as the act of the 3d March, 1851, most effectually excludes it from the mail.

"For example, a transient paper from this city, conveyed over fifteen hundred miles, would be charged six cents postage, if paid in advance; but if not paid in advance, the postage would be twelve cents; if sent to California or Oregon, the postage would be ten cents prepaid, or twenty cents not prepaid. Many of the newspapers published in the United States, such as the New York Journal of Commerce, and the New York Courier and Enquirer, weigh over two ounces; a transient newspaper of this class, sent to California or Oregon, would be charged fifteen cents postage, prepaid, or thirty cents, not prepaid.

"On periodicals, and other printed matter, this law operates equally onerous. Take, for example, Harpers' and the International Magazines; these periodicals weigh eight ounces each; consequently a single number sent to California or Oregon would be charged forty cents postage prepaid, or eighty cents not prepaid. Almost all the valuable periodicals of the country are affected in the same way, making the cost of transmission by mail, on long distances, more than equal to the actual cost of publication. In consequence, then, of the operation of the act of the 3d March, nearly all the periodicals of the country are excluded from the mails, and the publishers compelled to resort to expresses, and private conveyances to send out their periodicals, greatly to the detriment of the revenues of the Post Office Department, all of which, to a very great extent, in the opinion of your committee, might be remedied by modification of the present rates of postage.

"There are many other matters of grievance complained of, under the act of the 3d March, 1851, relative to its operation upon newspapers, periodicals, and other printed matter; but your committee think that enough has been said to convince every candid mind that the rates of postage of newspapers, periodicals, and other printed matter, are both complicated and burdensome, and afford just grounds of complaint; to remedy which, your committee have prepared a bill which simplifies the rates of postage, rendering them uniform and cheap, having, at the same time, a proper regard to the revenues of the Post Office Department."

The bill as it will read, if it be amended as proposed by the committee:

Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and fifty-two, the postage upon all printed matter passing through the mail of the United States, instead of the rates now charged, shall be as follows, to wit: Each newspaper, pamphlet, periodical, magazine, book, bound or unbound, circular, catalogue, and every other description of printed matter unconnected with any manuscript or writing, and of no greater weight than two ounces, shall be charged with one cent postage, and one cent for each additional ounce, or fraction of an ounce, for any distance under three thousand miles; and for any distance over three thousand miles, double those rates. All newspapers and periodicals not weighing over one ounce, published regularly as often as once in three months, and sent from the office of publication to actual subscribers, shall be chargeable with only one half the foregoing rates. The postage upon all printed matter shall be prepaid at the office where it is mailed, or paid quarterly in advance at the office of delivery; or otherwise double the foregoing rates shall be charged thereon.

Sec 2. And be it further enacted, That books, bound or unbound, not weighing over four pounds, shall be deemed mailable matter, and all printed matter chargeable by weight shall be weighed when dry. The publishers of newspapers and periodicals may send to each other, from their respective offices of publication, free of postage, one copy of each publication; and may also send to each actual subscriber, enclosed in their publications, bills and receipts for the same, free of postage. The publishers of weekly newspapers may send to each actual subscriber within the country where their papers are printed and published, one copy thereof free of postage.

[The sections 3, 4, and 5, proposed by the committee as an addition, will be found published above.]

The question was then taken upon Mr. OLDS's motion, and it was agreed to.

So the resolution was postponed.

JOHN T. SULLIVAN.

Mr. OLDS, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which was referred Senate bill No. 130, entitled "An act for the relief of John T. Sullivan," reported the same without amendment.

Ordered, That the said bill be committed to a Committee of the Whole House, and made the order of the day for tomorrow.

REVENUES OF POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. OLDS, from the same committee, reported a bill, No. 294, for the better protection of the revenues of the Post Office Department, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time by its title, committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

MAIL ROUTES.

Mr. OLDS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to report back joint resolution No. 9, establishing certain mail routes, which I will ask may be read and put upon its passage.

The bill was read through.

Mr. BENNETT. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to allow me to introduce the following amendment. I ask that it may be read.

The amendment was then read, as follows:

And that the road from Vallonia Springs, in Broome county, New York, by the way of Nineveh and Coventry, to Oxford, be, and the same is hereby, declared a post road. And the Postmaster General is authorized to pay a reasonable compensation for carrying the mail on said route, by direction of the Department, previous to this time.

And that the road from Oxford, aforesaid, by the way of Coventryville, to South Bainbridge, be, and the same is hereby, declared a post road.

Mr. BENNETT. I wish to make a statement to the House in regard to this road. After the New York and Erie railroad was built, a plank road was commenced, and is in part completed, from it, by the way of Vallonia Springs, Nineveh, and Coventry, to Oxford, in my district. It shortened the mail route about forty miles to New York. The mail was formerly carried to Binghamton, and then up the Chenango Valley, and back across to the valley of the Unadilla river. The people at several offices got their mail and papers upon the same day they are printed and mailed in the city of New York, by this route. By the other route they did not get them until the day afterwards. The Postmaster General was so well satisfied with this improvement that, although it was not a post route, and not completed entirely, he directed the mail to be carried over that route, instead of being carried over the old circuitous route by Binghamton. The change was made with his consent. It accommodates several post offices in my district. It is a great improvement and convenience, and the expense of carrying the mail on the new route is less than it would be on the old route. I hope there will be no objection made to the change. It was done by the direction of the Department, and the object of this amendment is simply to allow the Department to pay so much for carrying the mail up to this time, as the Postmaster General himself shall think proper. They could not change the route in any other way. Until a law is passed establishing this as a post route, he had no legal right to pay for carrying the mail upon it.

Mr. OLDS. I will say with regard to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BENNETT,] that I have no doubt the facts are as stated by him, and that an amendment in this or some other bill should obtain favor with the House. It strikes me, however, that it would be more proper in the general post route bill which will be reported in a few days, than upon this resolution, which is simply a resolution declaring all plank roads mail routes. I leave the matter entirely with the House.

Mr. BENNETT. Let me say a word about that. This resolution was introduced through my application in the Senate. It was supposed that it would be sufficient, if applied to all plank roads, and that it would reach my case. But this is not a plank road all the way, and the resolution will not, therefore, reach the case I have presented. And it does not give any authority to make payment for carrying the mail heretofore—for both of which reasons this amendment is necessary. And this is the very place for fixing this matter, in this joint resolution, and not in the general act creating post roads.

The question was then taken upon Mr. BENNETT's amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. STUART. I desire to offer an amendment to that bill, to include all public highways. I have been at a loss to discover why Congress should spend month after month in every year to get up a lengthy bill and pass it, covering any mail route which anybody may ask for. I see no objection why every public highway in the United States should not be declared a mail route, reserving to the Postmaster General the right to put on the mail whenever he pleases, and not until he pleases.

Mr. SACKETT. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him? I state this objection to it, that if public highways were declared mail routes, private carriers for sending mails or letters between individuals upon all public highways, would be cut off, and subject to the penalties of the Post Office law.

Mr. STUART. That is a very great mistake, I think. There would be no such difficulty at all, until the Department put the mail on the route. There is no reason in the world, that I have been able to discover, why every road now built, or hereafter to be built in the United States, should not be declared a mail route, reserving, as I said before, to the Postmaster General the discretion to say when he would put the mail service upon it. We spend thousands of dollars every single year here in enacting laws establishing mail routes, and I venture to say, that in the history of twenty-five years, there has never been an application denied. In that duty, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads have been so crowded by business of this sort, that they needed a clerk to do what, by this bill, can be done in two hours. Just insert after "plank roads" the words "public highways," and that thing is done, and forever.

Mr. MOREHEAD. I do not know that I understand this thing as the gentleman does. I ask him whether he intends to confer upon the Postmaster General the responsibility of saying that there shall be post roads where all the public highways are made? It seems to me that it lies with him now to say where the post routes shall be, without reference at all to members of Congress.

Mr. STUART. The gentleman does not understand me. It is to declare every public highway a post route and post road, making it a general provision. The law would remain as it is now, so far as the discretion of the Postmaster General is concerned. After Congress goes on here, and passes a long bill establishing post roads, the Postmaster General exercises his discretion in putting mail service upon such roads, and the kind of service. The only difference between the former method and the plan I propose is, that whenever it was necessary to put mail service upon a route, you would only have to apply to the Postmaster General, and satisfy him that the wants of the community required it, and that the revenues of the Department would permit it, and he would do it. Congress would not be troubled again. It would save a vast deal of special legislation.

Mr. MOREHEAD. The law, as it now exists, designates the termini of mail routes. When it is to be carried into execution the Postmaster General is to say. If I understand the gentleman correctly, all public highways, by his proposition, are made post routes at the discretion of the Postmaster General.

Mr. STUART. They are made post roads absolutely.

Mr. MOREHEAD. Made so absolutely! There may be half a dozen roads leading to the same points. I wish to understand from the gentleman whether the idea is this: that it shall belong to the Postmaster General to say which one of these half dozen roads shall be adopted as the post route?

Mr. STUART. Which one; any, or all of them. The difficulty at any rate, which now exists, would be obviated. If a gentleman goes to the Postmaster General now, and asks to have a route changed, and the mail transferred from one road to another, because it would save ten miles and reach a given point more directly, what is the answer? Why, that it cannot be done, because the one to which it is proposed to be changed, is not a post road. Although the community wish it, and the Postmaster General is abundantly willing to do it, and the revenues of the Department would be benefited by it, yet it cannot be done because it is not a post road. I can see no evil, I repeat, in making every road in the United States, now laid out or hereafter to be laid out, a post road. No further legislation upon the subject than that would be required. The other provisions of the law which controls the discretion of the Postmaster General would apply to all others, and it would save an immense amount of labor to the committee and Congress, and a vast expense to the country.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. The proposition of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STUART] is an extremely convenient one, but it occurs to my mind that it is rather wholesale in its character. By a single effort the responsibility which devolves upon Congress by the Constitution, or rather in a single effort, without any discretion, it exhausts at once the whole power conferred upon Congress by the Constitution; and it is done under the pretense of convenience. It is a transference at once to the Executive Department of the legislative discretion which is vested by the Constitution in the Representatives of the people.

I am not, for one, willing, whatever trouble and inconvenience the Post Office service may suffer, to lay down a precedent by which the Representatives of the people shall transfer their constitutional duties, substantially, to the head of an Executive Department. We have now declared by law, I believe, that all navigable waters of the United States are mail routes. Now, the proposition comes that we shall declare all the highways of the United States mail roads, and that it shall hereafter be the prerogative of the head of the Post Office Department to choose which of these he will establish as a mail route, and when he shall put service upon them. In other words, they propose that we shall exhaust the whole power vested in the Representatives of the people by the Constitution, and that the administration of the Constitution shall henceforth be trusted to the head of the Post Office Department, to be exercised how, and when, and where he chooses. Now, sir, this may be very convenient; but it seems to me that it is taking steps towards the transference of the legitimate power of this Chamber to the Post Office Department at rather too rapid a rate.

Mr. GREY. I do not see that there can be any good and well-founded objection urged to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STUART.] Now, every year a long bill is reported establishing mail routes, and often the same roads are declared several times, in several different bills, to be mail routes. No proposition to the committee to establish a mail route is ever denied. Every proposition made is granted, and put in the general bill. It does not at all compel the Postmaster General to put mail service upon the road because it is declared a post route. It leaves it to his discretion, and the Postmaster General has stated, that it is impossible for him to tell, without more labor than he had clerks in the office, to inform us, what roads were mail routes, and what not. What mail routes have been established by previous Congresses, for years past, it is impossible to tell. Now, sir, it requires great labor and a great expenditure of time, at every session, to prepare and pass this general bill, and I can see no objection to the disposing of all this labor, by adopting the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan, declaring every road in the United States a post route, and I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. MOREHEAD. I have only one additional observation to add to what fell from the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL.] If the amendment is adopted, I understand then that every public road in the United States is a post office route—a post road. That would be the effect of the amendment. It then throws the whole establishment of post offices and post routes, and the number of them, upon the discretion of the Postmaster General. Now, I do not understand how Congress could ever make any calculation to meet by its appropriation that branch of public expenditure. One Postmaster General might adopt every road that had been laid out by the Legislature of every State. Another might act with greater discretion and not adopt half as many. It seems to me that the whole subject would be involved in great difficulty, and that Congress would know nothing about the extent of expenditure which might be incurred in that branch of the public service. Taking this view of it, in addition to that taken by the gentleman from Kentucky, it seems to me that a more uncertain policy could not be adopted by a legislative body.

Mr. FOWLER. In reply to the gentleman who has just spoken, it is sufficient to observe that a very large number of public roads or highways are already mail routes that are not occupied as such—perhaps three fourths of the roads of the country have already been recognized by Congress, but the Postmaster General does not put mails upon them. He never will do it until there is an appropriation for it. And if all the roads in the country, all the public highways, are made mail routes by this amendment, he will still go on just as he has done, exercising his discretion, and never adopting a route until the public service calls for it. I think, sir, the objection is wholly without foundation, when viewed as it should be, in connection with the fact that mail routes established by Congress do not, of course, require the Postmaster General to put a mail upon them.

Mr. EVANS. Three or four years ago I introduced the very amendment which is now introduced by the gentleman from Michigan. The House debated it, and decided in favor of the gentleman from Kentucky against my amendment. I never myself could see any reason why we should not at once make all the public highways, mail routes.

[Here a message was received from the President of the United States, by the hands of MILLARD P. FILLMORE, his private Secretary, informing the House that the President had approved the following bills:

An act to amend an act entitled "An act for the punishment of crimes in the District of Columbia;"

An act for the relief of John Jackson; and

A joint resolution accepting from Guiseppe Fazagni a portrait of Henry Clay, and ordering it to be placed in the Library of Congress.]

Mr. EVANS, (resuming.) I say, sir, that there is no good objection against making every road in the United States a mail route. Seeing no such difficulty, I introduced an amendment; the House discussed it, and voted it down, and I never ventured upon it since. But there is one little difficulty which the gentleman will have to guard against in offering his amendment, and it is this: The law requires post offices generally to advertise every mail route, and unless some provision is made in the gentleman's amendment, it will lead to rather an extensive system of advertising. So long as you declare mail routes, the Postmaster General advertises them. The law requires him to do so. Now, I think the amendment very proper, and I will vote for it, if the gentleman will put at the end some provision that the Postmaster General shall not advertise any routes but those he thinks the public service require to be advertised. With that limitation we must certainly suppose that the Postmaster General will not be guilty of any gross abuse of power, and we shall get rid of a great deal of trouble and difficulty, and save much time in the House. If we find that the power was abused, nothing in the world would be easier than to repeal this provision which is sought to be carried out by the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. STUART. I was aware, sir, of the law which the gentleman from Maryland has alluded to, and an additional amendment to this bill, or an amendment to the general bill, which is to be reported, will be necessary in order to obviate that difficulty. But there is no difficulty in adopting an amendment, which will meet the objection suggested by the gentleman from Maryland. As the law stands now, sir, there is a vast deal of unnecessary expense every year in advertising mail routes, on which no service is put, and the difficulty referred to by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GREY] exists at the same time. An entire mail route, or more frequently parcels of a particular mail route are in one, two, three, or four, or more bills, and it is advertised over and over again.

Bids are sent in to the Departments here producing perfect confusion, and I have spent three months of this present session in getting straightened out a provision of that sort in reference to one of the roads in my district, before I could get a mail established. Now, let this amendment be adopted, and then, if the House please, in this very bill, give to the Postmaster discretion as to what routes he will advertise for service. But it will be found, by an examination of the legislation upon this subject, that very great injustice is done every year to the public, and that a vast amount of expense is incurred every year in adopting routes that are of no sort of importance; for, when petitions are sent here to a member, he refers them to the committee, and every petition referred is reported upon favorably. The whole thing can be done better, more economically to the Department, and better subserve the interests of the public, by adopting this amendment, and then, either in this bill, or in some other, restricting the law in regard to the advertisements of the mail service.

Mr. BISSELL. The morning hour having expired, I move that the House proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. OLDS. I move to recommit that bill to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. BISSELL. I will yield the floor for that purpose, although I have made the motion.

The SPEAKER. The motion will be entered.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. (Mr. STUART in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated as the first business in order before the committee, the consideration of House bill No. 297, to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the year ending 30th June, 1852, upon which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HOWARD] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOWARD addressed the committee in favor of the amendment of the Senate adding the following proviso to the item of the bill appropriating $80,000 for running and marking the boundary line between the United States and Mexico, according to the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo:

"Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to sanction a departure from the point on the Rio Grande north of the town called Paso, designated in the said treaty."

He also advocated the amendment of the Senate giving an increased compensation to the Collins line of steamers. [His speech is published in the Appendix.]

Mr. CHANDLER occupied the floor an hour in favor of the amendment of the Senate increasing the appropriation to the Collins line of steamers. He defended the appropriation on high national grounds. [Mr. C's speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio, obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. VENABLE. As the debate is to close to-morrow at twelve o'clock, and as I desire to say something upon the subject of the Collins line of steamers before it is closed, I hope the committee will take a recess and have an afternoon session. [Cries "Agreed!" "Agreed!"]

Mr. STANTON. I cannot yield for that motion. We will not meet here this evening; that is all about that.

Mr. VENABLE. All I ask is, that when the gentleman shall have concluded his speech, the committee will take a recess until five o'clock this evening. Let us take our dinner and then return.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the committee to indulge him in a single word. He will be glad to come back here at such hour as would suit the committee to hear gentlemen who desire to speak on this question. The Chair is advised there are several who desire to make speeches on the subject immediately under consideration.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. If it be in order I move that when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANTON] yields the floor, the committee take a recess until five o'clock this afternoon. I wish to put my proposition distinctly before the committee. I understand from parliamentarians that it is in order.

Mr. STANTON. I will agree to that.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I insist upon the question of order, that the committee have not the power.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I must beg leave to say one word. This has been the universal practice of the House. The committee have full powers to take a recess, if they please, before they rise. There is no doubt about that.

The question was then put on the proposition to take a recess till five o'clock in the evening, and it was agreed to.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio, then resumed the floor, and addressed the committee an hour. After alluding to politics, and expressing the belief that the speech of Mr. Toombs would be the means of gaining several thousand votes for General Scott in Ohio, proceeded to oppose the Senate amendment proposing an increase of compensation to the Collins line of steamers. [Mr. S's speech is published in the Appendix.]

Mr. VENABLE then obtained the floor, when the committee took a recess until five o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The committee reassembled at five o'clock, about thirty members being in attendance.

Mr. VENABLE opposed the amendment of the Senate, proposing increased compensation to the Collins line of steamers, and argued to prove that they were unfit for war purposes. [For speech see Appendix.]

Mr. CARTER addressed the committee in favor of the amendment, and gave the reasons which induced him to part company with gentlemen with whom he had been in the habit of acting upon similar questions, and for whom he entertained the highest and most sincere respect. He proceeded to show that the Collins line could not survive competition with the Cunard line without the aid of Government, and contended that the amendment was constitutional. He denied that to pass the amendment would be to create and maintain a monopoly, and declared that, as far as the Government had aided this line, it had been directly to destroy monopoly. He should feel his nation degraded from the discharge of a high duty if it should suffer this line to retire from the contest under the gallant triumphs they had achieved in this race of competition. They should not do it if his vote could prevent it. [For speech see Appendix.]

Mr. EVANS occupied the floor an hour, maintaining that the appropriation to the Collins line was a national question—one that appealed to his heart as an American—and he would give the amendment a cordial support. He did this without having been appealed to from any quarter, and he understood there were agents upon both sides—that there were agents seeking to obtain this appropriation, and some underhand British agents, with large sums of money, attempting to operate upon the American Congress against American interests. He held that he was free to choose one or the other, and he did choose to take his position for American interests. He argued strongly in favor of the amendment. [For speech see Appendix.]

The committee then rose.

And the House, at eight o'clock, adjourned until to-morrow at eleven o'clock.

PETITIONS, &c.

The following petitions, memorials, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. AVERETT: The petition of James Rangeley, of Henry county, Virginia, praying indemnity for French spoliation prior to 1800.

By Mr. PARKER, of Indiana: The petition of Joseph Yount, G. H. Balingall, and 72 others, citizens of the State of Indiana, praying for a grant of lands to construct a continuous and direct line of railroad through from Cincinnati, Ohio, to Chicago, Illinois, via New Castle and Logansport.

By Mr. BRAGG: The petition of Augustus B. Ward and Julien Chevalier, praying for a law authorizing them to perfect their title to a piece of land in the district of St. Stephens, Alabama.

By Mr. BRENTON: The petition of Samuel Kinsey and 110 others, asking for a mail route from Columbia, Whitley county, via Thorn creek to Albion, Noble county, Indiana.

By Mr. HENN: The petition of R. W. Steele and 75 others, asking for the establishment of a land office at Indianapolis, Warren county, Iowa.

By Mr. SMART: The petition of Mary Chapman, of Starks, Maine, for relief.

By Mr. McMULLIN: The petition of F. Broket, assistant marshal, praying additional compensation for taking the census.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, July 7, 1852.

Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

Mr. CHASE. Mr. President, I desire to present the petition of Washington Moorehead, of Zanesville, Ohio, who represents that Passed Midshipman Joseph Moorehead, on the Brazilian station, was found guilty by a court-martial of scandalous conduct, and that it has been subsequently ascertained that he was in point of fact insane. The petitioner prays that Congress will take this case into consideration, and pass such a law as may be necessary to remedy the grievance of which complaint is made. I believe the case to be a meritorious one, and desire that the petition may be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and I hope that the committee will take it into careful consideration.

It was so referred.

Also, a petition of merchants of Cincinnati, praying for the free navigation of, and the construction of an additional canal around the Falls of the Ohio; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Also, a petition of citizens of Belmont county, Ohio, praying that the bridges of the Wheeling and Belmont Bridge Company, may be established as mail routes; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. PRATT presented the petition of Gotlieb A. Kriezer, late a marine on board the United States ship "Marion," praying to be allowed the difference between the pay of a marine and that of surgeon's steward during the time he acted in the latter capacity; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. DAVIS presented a petition of John Janvrin, and others, citizens of Newburyport, Massachusetts, in reference to the right construction of the provisions of the convention between the United States and Great Britain, of 1818, upon the subject of the fisheries. The petitioners represent that an interpretation has been given by some of the authorities of Great Britain to that treaty which they believe to be erroneous, and that they have been informed that measures have been taken by the British Government which, if carried out, will almost wholly deprive the citizens of this country of the right to carry on the fisheries as intended to be secured by said convention. The petition was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BORLAND presented the petition of Anna Murphy, widow of Bartholomew Murphy, a revolutionary soldier, praying to be allowed a pension for the services of her late husband during the revolutionary war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ATCHISON presented the proceedings of a meeting of citizens and inhabitants of Parkville, Missouri, in favor of the organization of the Territory of Nebraska; which were referred to the Committee on the Territories.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the petition of Thos. S. J. Johnson, praying payment for wagons taken for the use of the United States Army in New Mexico; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHIELDS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill from the House of Representatives to provide for the protection of the Territories of New Mexico and Oregon, and the States of Texas and California, reported it back with an amendment.

He also submitted a report on the subject, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. GEYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Thomas P. Dudley, reported it back without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of B. B. Bennett, submitted an adverse report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the memorial of Mary W. Thompson, in behalf of widows of officers of the Army, reported a bill to continue half pay to certain widows and orphans; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. BRADBURY. Mr. President, the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred a resolution of the State of California, asking for a change in the day on which the electors of that State shall give in their votes for President and Vice President of the United States, have instructed me to make an adverse report. Perhaps it may be convenient for me to state that the Constitution of the United States provides that the day on which the electors shall give in their votes shall be the same throughout the United States. Any change must therefore be general. Regarding the inconvenience now experienced in the State of California to be less than that which would result from a general change, the committee have instructed me to report against the desired alteration. I move that the report be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the petition of Chandler C. Yonge, praying additional compensation, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition and papers; which was agreed to.

THE PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. CLEMENS, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution in relation to the public printing; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

The resolution proposes to provide, that during the present session, and of each succeeding Congress, the Senate and House of Representatives shall proceed to the election of a public printer for each House respectively; the election in all cases to be  viva voce  upon a call of the yeas and nays. The public printers elected are to give bonds, with approved securities, for the faithful performance of the work. The Joint Committee on Printing are to be judges of any violations of said contracts, either in style or manner, and in case of any violations of the same, the printing may be ordered, by the joint committee, to be executed by another printer, and the public printers charged with the expense caused by such violations. It also provides that, for all work of a special character ordered by either House, not properly embraced in the contracts, the public printers are to be entitled to a preference over other bidders, provided their rates for the same are reasonable and fair. There is to be no charge for double composition on any work ordered jointly by the two Houses.

JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution for the purchase of the Half-Breed Tract on Lake Pepin, in Minnesota Territory; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

BILLS PASSED.

The following engrossed bills were read a third time and passed:

An act for the relief of L. M. Goldsborough and others; and

An act for the relief of Richard Fitzpatrick.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives was received by Mr. HAYS, its Chief Clerk, announcing that it had passed the joint resolution from the Senate to establish certain post routes, with an amendment.

SURVEYING DISTRICT OF ALABAMA.

On motion by Mr. FELCH, the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to establish the subdivisional lines and corners of certain fractional sections in the southern surveying district of the State of Alabama; and no amendment being made, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

SECURITY OF LIFE ON BOARD STEAMERS.

The bill to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam," was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, this is a bill of considerable importance, affecting property more or less to a considerable amount; and it is, perhaps, appropriate that I should, in as summary a way as circumstances will permit, bring before the Senate, in the first place, the causes which demand this bill; and, in the second place, the remedies which are proposed. In doing this my main and principal object will be to present to the consideration of the Senate those statistics which belong to the subject, and which will afford them, I think, all the information which they will desire.

I would premise, however, before entering upon the exhibition of these statistics, that this is a subject of very complicated character; that it is surrounded, as every gentleman who has paid any attention to it well knows, with various and complicated embarrassments. In the first place, you have to contend with the feeling of selfishness which always belongs to property holders. Life in steamers cannot be better secured without measures which, from their necessary stringency, excite the distrust if not the hostility of the owners of such vessels. They prefer the unrestrained liberty of managing their own affairs according to their discretion, though a mercenary spirit may and often does triumph over all sympathy for those exposed to destruction from explosions and other causes. In the next place, you have to encounter greater or less diversity of opinion as to the remedy. And then, again, perhaps there is no very great uniformity of opinion as to the causes of the catastrophes which have happened, and which demand legislation. But, sir, I think they are all agreed in one thing; at any rate, in the various correspondence which I have had and all the various gentlemen who have done me the honor to confer with me upon the subject, I have found no individual who is not of opinion that something should be done by Congress—that something may usefully be done to suppress the calamities, or at least the dangers which now exist.

In order that the Senate may understand the magnitude of the interest with which we are dealing, I will lay before them some statistics, which I have been able to collect from the various sources which are open to research. The statistics which I am able to command have been collected at considerable labor, and from sources, though not in all instances entirely reliable, yet the errors, if any exist, are not of a character to mislead the judgment.

In the first place, we want to know the number of steamers in the United States. We want to know the magnitude of this interest as it has existed in preceding times. We want to understand something of the effect which the progress of events has exhibited to the public in the business of steamers. I am not able to present very complete information upon this subject, but, to some extent, I may say it is quite satisfactory. I was in hopes, at one time, that I should be able to communicate to the Senate some account of every steamer which, from the commencement of the business, has been built in the United States down to this day, and be able to exhibit to them an account, if any disaster has befallen them, of that disaster. I am very happy to say, that while I cannot do this as regards the whole country, I am yet able, to a reasonable extent, to do it in regard to that portion which has been most afflicted with difficulties, and where the greatest disasters have happened. I allude to the waters of the West—the great Valley of the Mississippi, and the Gulf connected with it. There has been presented and laid on our tables an exhibit of that description—drawn out upon a resolution passed by the Senate upon my motion—giving an account, I believe, of every steamer which has been constructed in that valley and upon the gulf from the commencement of steaming down to the year 1849; and also an account of every disaster which has resulted in the destruction of the vessel. The absence of complete information as regards the residue of the country is the less to be regretted since, if we can abate or suppress the calamities now of frequent occurrence in that region, the means by which it is done will be a sufficient corrective for other portions of the country. But I have more complete information in regard to a specific period. The Senate were kind enough to pass a resolution the session before the last, I think, by which they directed the Secretary of the Treasury to collect the statistics for the year ending the 30th of June, 1851—the political year. That service has been accomplished with considerable industry. We have, then, the statistics resulting from the return of the Secretary of the Treasury showing the whole number of steamers then existing in the United States, the disasters occurring within that year, and the number of lives, as far as could be ascertained, lost by shipwreck, and from other causes.

Mr. President, I am unwilling to take up the time of the Senate, further than to bring out substantially these statistics, and to state the remedies which are proposed.

According to the list to which I have adverted, the whole number of steamers which have been built in the Valley of the Mississippi and upon the Gulf, up to 1849, was 1,656. Of this number, 736 have been destroyed in the following ways, to wit: 419 were sunk, chiefly by snags; 104 were burnt; 82 were destroyed by the explosion of boilers; 67 were destroyed by the collapse of flues; 19 by the bursting of pipes; making altogether by explosions, 168; and 45 were destroyed by collision. The loss of property by the destruction of these vessels, including none excepting where the loss was total, is estimated at $5,643,791 for the vessels. The destruction of cargoes in the same vessels has been carefully estimated at $12,698,529, making in this valley and gulf, during that period, a total loss of property, amounting to $18,342,320.

The Senate, perhaps, will be surprised at the magnitude of this loss, compared with the whole interest. When we come to look at it, and compare it with the whole, we find that the loss amounts to 44 per cent. on the value of the whole property engaged during the period, from the commencement of steaming down to 1849.

We have no data by which the sacrifice of life can be stated, with entirely reliable accuracy. In December, 1848, the Commissioner of Patents was directed to ascertain the number who had perished by explosions only. He reported that in 164 cases of explosion or collapse, which had come under his knowledge, 1,805 persons were killed, and in 111 of those cases, 1,015 persons were wounded. He further estimates, by averaging the cases where the number has been ascertained, the loss of life in the cases of explosion, &c., ascertained by him to have previously taken place in the United States, at 2,563. The number of wounded he has estimated, on the same principle, at 2,097, making a total of 4,660 killed and wounded by explosions alone. These estimates probably fall below the truth. The inquiry of the Commissioner was limited to explosions only, while mine has extended to all kinds of disasters which have proved fatal to life. And although the data collected by him and that employed by me do not admit of a direct test by comparison, yet I am persuaded that the fact will be made manifest, when we come to the more correct statistics to which I have adverted, that he under-estimates. As I remarked to the Senate, we have the returns for the year ending on the 30th of June, 1851. We have these details in a substantial and reliable form, and when the Senate come to compare them with the estimates made by the Commissioner of Patents, they will be satisfied that it was an under-estimate on his part.

According to the returns for the year ending June 30th, 1851, the entire mercantile steam marine of the United States, including ferry boats, numbered 1,390 vessels, with a tonnage of 417,225, distributed as follows: on the Atlantic coast, 625 vessels, with a tonnage of 212,500; on the interior waters, 765 vessels, against 625 on the coast, and a tonnage of 204,725 against a tonnage of 212,000. These vessels, again, are classed in a different form, indicating more specifically the kind of employment on which they were engaged, as follows:

	No.	Tonnage.
On the Atlantic coast, ocean steamers.....	96	91,475
Steamers drove by paddle-wheels.....	382	90,738
Ferry boats do.....	80	18,041
Propellers.....	67	12,245
Total on Atlantic coast.....	625	212,500

The same classification is made in regard to the interior waters. The number of steamers upon the interior waters, driven by paddle-wheels, for the year ending June 30th, 1851, was 663; and the tonnage 187,262. There were on the same waters 50 ferry boats, with a tonnage of 15,729; 52 propellers, with a tonnage of 4,733; making a total of 765 vessels, with a tonnage of 204,725. The aggregate of officers and crew, I am also able to state. The aggregate number of men employed on board of all of these vessels was, for that year, 29,377—on the Atlantic, 11,770; in the interior, 17,607.

The next point on which the Senate may want some information, is in regard to the number of passengers. I have therefore collected statistics in regard to the transportation of passengers, and they present some curious and striking facts. The number of passengers transported by steamers the same year, ending June 30th, 1851, was, 39,204,691. They were carried as follows: On the coast waters, in ferry boats, 29,315,576; on other steamers of all kinds, on the same waters, 4,027,270. On the waters of the interior, in ferry boats, 3,102,531; on steamers of all other kinds, 2,759,314; making a total aggregate of 39,204,191 passengers transported.

It may be interesting to the Senate also to know something of the amount of property which is destroyed from year to year; and we have probably an accurate estimate for the year in question. In the same year, the vessels of all kinds wrecked, including vessels under sail as well as steamers, was 446. Of these, 118 belonged to the interior; 76 to the western rivers, and 42 to the lakes. The 76 were all steamers, and a part, though the exact proportion cannot be ascertained, of the vessels wrecked on the lakes, were steamers. The value of the property destroyed, together with these 118 vessels in the interior, is estimated at $1,585,400. The estimated loss from the same cause in the same territory, in 1849, which I have been able to obtain, is $1,568,106—falling little short of the estimate for the year 1851. On the Atlantic and Pacific coasts the number of vessels of all kinds lost during the year ending June 30, 1851, was 328; 20 of these were steamers; but I have no estimate of the value of the property destroyed on the seas or sea-coast.

The next point to which I wish to invite the attention of the Senate, is the loss of life for the same year, ending June 30, 1851. The whole number ascertained is 1,013. It is distributed as follows, and the distribution presents some very striking considerations: Out of these 1,013, on the waters of the interior were 695; of this number 628 lives were lost on the rivers—all belonging to steamers. The total loss on the lakes was 67, part in steamers. On the sea and sea-coast the whole number lost during the year was 318, in 308 vessels under sail. In addition to this, 20 steamers on the coast give a loss of 29 persons. From these data it appears that nearly 700 out of 1,000 persons who have perished in the whole mercantile marine during the year in question, lost their lives on board steamers—making some nine or ten to every steamer which was lost, while the whole loss on the coast averaged about one to a vessel. If the proportion of loss upon the coast had been as great as that upon the interior waters, the amount would have been swelled up to 3,424.

I state these facts to show the Senate the actual condition of things. And I ought to add here, that it is stated upon the authority of those who gathered these statistics, and, I have no doubt, is very well founded, that the year in question does not come up to the average of years; that it was more favorable than the average of years as regards the loss of life. They mention, to illustrate this, the following cases as happening just previous to the commencement of the year selected, namely: the steamer Troy, of Buffalo, exploded her boilers, killing 9 persons; the G. P. Griffith was burned, destroying 250 persons; the Anthony Wayne was burned, destroying 65 persons;—making 324 lives lost within a very short period antecedent to the commencement of the same year. The estimate of the property which I have already stated, bears out the hypothesis that this falls below the average of years.

In 1849 the loss upon the western rivers only, is stated at $1,585,400, while the loss upon all the western rivers in the year ending June 30, 1851, is $1,568,106; being less, although we know there was a large aggregate increase in the number of steamers and the value of property of that description. Favorable as this year is, if it were assumed as an average of the destruction of life and property, and applied to the past, it would present us with an appalling picture of the calamities incident to steamers.

I may add here, for the information of the Senate, that I have obtained from time to time, through means of information open to all gentlemen during the current year, the losses which have happened, which must, as all know, come mainly through the newspaper press; and I have the minutes of a series of disasters here which I shall not stop to read to the Senate, showing a loss since the first of January last by explosions of steamers, and the destruction of steamers by fire, of 318 persons—to which you may add the number recently destroyed at New Orleans, the information of which reached us this morning. A large number, some 50, were destroyed there, and among them a gentleman of great worth, for whom I have the very highest respect—a judge of the courts of Louisiana.

Without dwelling upon these facts, which speak a language too intelligible to be misunderstood, it is manifestly our duty to interpose and prevent this reckless, unnecessary sacrifice of human beings—I will say nothing of the terrible waste of property, for that is not a disaster without remedy—but if remedied, it seems to me Congress ought to interfere and check, if not able entirely to suppress, the inhumanity which prevails.

I wish now to ask the attention of the Senate for a few moments to the causes of disaster. The first cause of which I shall speak is fire.

Fires often occur, and have in many instances been fatal almost beyond example. I will cite two or three instances to illustrate the necessity of greater precaution against such disasters. In 1851, the G. P. Griffith took fire when within a short distance of the shore of Lake Erie, and two hundred and fifty persons perished. Some year or two previous, a steamer took fire in sight of the shore of Lake Michigan, when nearly as many lives were sacrificed for the want of means to be carried to the shore. At an earlier day, the Lexington took fire while near the shore of Long Island, and nearly all the passengers and crew perished. Of seven hundred and thirty-six vessels destroyed on the western rivers, previous to 1849, one hundred and four were burnt, and during that year no less than forty-six were burnt. It would seem from these facts, that fire has proved itself one of the most fatal enemies of steamers. It is manifest that the exposure to destruction from this cause is great, especially in vessels propelled by high-pressure engines. The occurrence of fire is much less frequent in low-pressure boats, but they are by no means exempt from such a catastrophe. The new ocean steamer Amazon, one of the English West India line, and a vessel of the first class, costing about half a million of dollars, recently fell a sacrifice to fire when a few hours out of port on her first voyage, and a large number of persons perished.

Believing that the state of things which exists demands correction, the committee have directed their attention to the subject with a view, first, to prevent the occurrence of fires through carelessness or negligence in adopting suitable measures of prevention. The inspectors are required to satisfy themselves, that effectual protection is given to wood and other combustible matters, when exposed to ignition by heat from any cause. The owners of vessels carrying passengers are forbidden to suspend cotton curtains or curtains alike combustible, to carry as freight gunpowder, spirits of turpentine, or any substance which ignites by friction; and in case any such article is carried as stores, it must be contained in a metallic vessel or vessels—and no certificate is to be granted to a vessel which does not comply with these provisions. There have been some suggestions of amendment on this head, and those amendments may be deemed necessary by the Senate, but I shall not stop to comment upon them. The provisions are made as matter of prevention—to prevent fires arising from careless and negligent conduct on the part of those who manage vessels.

But fires, nevertheless, whatever the precaution may be, will arise—they will happen, and then the next step is, if they do occur, to provide suitable means for their extinguishment. In case fire does occur, notwithstanding these precautions, the bill then provides to require suitable means for its extinguishment—all vessels carrying more than fifty passengers are to be supplied with three forcing pumps of six inch caliber, one at least to be prepared to work by steam power, and each to be supplied with a hose, always ready for use. Each vessel is also to have a certain number of fire buckets and axes, in proportion to its tonnage.

But we suppose that cases will happen in which the extinguishment of fire will be unsuccessful, or may be impossible. It then becomes necessary to go a step further, and provide for the escape of those on board of vessels thus on fire. Our attention was drawn to that point, and we have provided in the bill for the escape of the passengers and crew, by requiring a certain number of life-boats and life-preservers, to prevent, if possible, the recurrence of such frightful disasters everywhere, and especially within a few hundred yards of the shore. The inspectors are required to visit vessels arriving and departing, and to see that this part of the act is complied with. If this be done, the committee feel great confidence in auspicious results.

The next matter which came under consideration, was the explosion of boilers, the collapsing of flues, the bursting of pipes, &c. This has been a prolific theme of speculation among the learned and the unlearned, the practical and the theoretical. Nevertheless, it has not been deemed expedient to enter into any of the controversies which do or have existed, or to adopt any particular theory of the causes of explosion or collapse. The explosions generally occur in high-pressure boilers, and the experience and observation of navigators and engineers, as well as the experiments of the learned, all concur in pointing to certain unmistakable evidence which precedes such disasters; and if these proofs of danger are seasonably noticed, and the progress towards a fatal catastrophe averted, as it may be, it will greatly diminish, if not put an end to such occurrences. Most explosions are accompanied by evidence indicating an unmistakable cause at work to produce them; but some causes escape the closest observation. These causes may be classed as follows:

First. The use of unsuitable material for the construction of boilers. The broken fragments of iron frequently disclose this fact.

Second. The form of the boiler may be unsuitable, or the workmanship unsatisfactory. The form should be such as to secure the greatest strength, sustained by the best workmanship, and when either or both are faulty, the boilers will probably fail.

Third. Negligence or unskillfulness in the use of the boilers.

Under the first of these heads many proofs have been furnished of iron wrought into boilers wholly unsuited for such purposes, and not only liable to give way, but almost certain to do so. Bad material is often used in the manufacture, and the iron fails from that cause. The material is also imperfectly worked, and being heated with mineral instead of charcoal, is not much superior to cast iron; indeed, cast iron has often been used for boiler heads. Again: the plates are rolled too thin for the size of the boilers, or if packed, are not thoroughly united by welding.

As a remedy for such of these imperfections as arise from bad material and the imperfect manufacture of iron, the bill provides for the inspection of all boiler iron, and forbids the working into boilers any not inspected. The inspectors must satisfy themselves that the plates which they approve, are equal in quality to the best kind of iron made with charcoal, and is at least one fourth of an inch thick, for a standard boiler. Our model boiler is one of forty-two inches diameter, made of plates one fourth of an inch thick—made of the best iron.

When the boiler is made and ready for use, another inspection takes place, and the inspector must satisfy himself that it is constructed of such materials as the act requires, and that the form and workmanship are satisfactory. This will meet and obviate the difficulties suggested under the second head, so far as new boilers are concerned, when taken in connection with the other provisions in regard to boilers.

But being aware that defects of materials and of workmanship may escape the observation of an intelligent observer, we have provided for testing the strength of every boiler, by hydrostatic pressure, under the regulations contained in the act, and have, after such trial and examination, authorized the inspector to rate the highest working power of the boiler, by the pressure upon the square inch, in conformity with which they are to fix the load of each safety-valve, and it is made penal to increase that pressure under any circumstances.

Under the third head of negligence and unskillfulness in the management of boilers, we have proofs from all quarters, of negligent, unskillful, and rash management often producing the saddest calamities. I will give some examples which show what is meant by the use of these terms.

If the water in the boiler is permitted to be so lowered that the metal uncovered about the flue or other parts of the boiler becomes highly heated, and while thus weakened by heat receives water suddenly injected, or thrown upon it by any other cause, an explosion or collapse is likely to follow, from the sudden conversion of water into steam. Many persons of great experience contend that much the larger portion of explosions and collapses happen from neglect to keep up the water to a proper and safe height in the boiler. The bill corrects this negligence, by providing for a constant, certain, and sufficient supply of water at all times, whether the vessel is in motion or at rest. It provides that, ordinarily, the water shall be kept at least four inches above the top of the flue.

Unskillfulness or imprudence is said to occur in overloading the safety valves, and thus, by undue and unsafe pressure, exposing the boilers to explosion. This occurs whenever there is an attempt to press a boiler beyond its capacity to sustain elastic steam. There is reason to believe that persons are employed as engineers who have not the knowledge and experience which are indispensable to the safe management of an engine. Neglect of duty, unskillfulness, and mismanagement are caused by the employment of unsuitable persons, and can only be remedied by displacing such and securing the services of persons who have higher and better qualities. The same rule also applies to pilots, as vessels are lost through the negligence or incompetence of pilots.

The bill provides for the appointment of all engineers for one year, upon careful and thorough examination of their characters and qualifications, and none other are to be allowed to serve on board steamers. A similar course is to be pursued in the appointment of pilots upon rivers. Any person desiring to be an engineer or pilot may offer himself, and may undergo an examination, and if his character and qualifications authorize it he will be appointed.

To carry out this system, and to secure the selection of competent and faithful engineers and pilots, two inspectors for each of the collection districts named in the act are to be appointed, one of whom, to be called the inspector of hulls, is to possess such a practical knowledge as to enable him to judge of the seaworthiness, and is also to be acquainted with the uses of steam as a power in navigation, so as to be able to perform the duties assigned to him. The other, to be called the inspector of boilers, is to possess a practical knowledge of the manufacture of boilers and the uses of the machinery employed in steaming, so as to be able to judge correctly of the character of both. These two are to be associated in their labors of inspection, and in the appointment of engineers and pilots for the district to which they belong, and for any district for which no inspector is appointed. The inspector of boilers is also to be the inspector of boiler iron within his district and in any district which has no such inspector.

Inspectors such as the act requires cannot be placed in every collection district without a very great expense, nor are such services required in the larger portion of the districts. We have endeavored so to place the inspectors that steamers for the most part, at one or the other end of the trip, will find a board to perform the service of inspection, but to meet and provide for exceptions to this rule the boards, as has been suggested, are empowered to grant certificates in any district destitute of inspectors. In addition to this, we have provided for nine supervising inspectors, who are to itinerate and, among other things, to visit destitute districts, both for the inspection of steamers and of boiler iron. These officers are designed to be persons of high practical qualifications, holding a general supervising power over the local boards, and securing not only a faithful, but a uniform execution of the law.

The inspectors, both general and local, are required to examine all the machinery and equipments of steamers, and to interpose and cause to be remedied whatever is imperfect or dangerous in its character.

If boilers are unfit for use, by reason of previous wear, or bad material, or bad workmanship, it is the duty of the inspector to know it and condemn such faults.

If the supply of water is inconstant or uncertain, it is his business to correct that dangerous defect. If he finds the valves have been loaded beyond the limit assigned, or in any way tampered with, it is his duty to prevent the repetition of such a violation of law and duty. In short, the vigilance of a faithful officer will never sleep, but he will visit vessels arriving and departing, and compel all concerned to obey the laws made for the protection of life and property, or to abide the penalties of disobedience.

Such are the principal provisions in regard to explosions, collapses, and the bursting of pipes.

Our object is, first, to improve the strength of boilers hereafter made, by the use of better material, better proportions, and more thorough workmanship. Second, to prevent abuses in the use of them, arising from rashness, want of skill, negligence, or other causes.

The committee next considered the disasters arising from collisions, snagging, and sinking. The disasters from these causes are of very great magnitude, and we have felt it to be our duty to seek for some plan of mitigation. These catastrophes often come from two causes:

1. Unnecessary collisions, by which vessels are seriously injured or sunk. These happen through negligence, carelessness, willful intention, and unskillfulness.

If a collision occurs through neglect, want of skill, or intention, it is the fault of the pilot, and must be corrected by the employment of a person of higher and better qualities, one who will observe and adhere to his duty, and not come in conflict if it can be avoided.

If a vessel is snagged or sunk from other causes, the disaster may occur without fault from any quarter, or it may happen through neglect, inattention, or rashness. The number of vessels lost in this manner is very great, and while many are destroyed by inevitable accident, others owe their fate to incompetent or negligent navigators.

We have applied two remedies for such disasters. First: we have established safe rules for meeting and passing in narrow and unsafe channels, which, if observed, will prevent collisions. This provision embodies the usages of navigators on rivers. Second: we have provided for the examination and appointment of all pilots upon the rivers and lakes, and none are to serve without a permit. This arrangement carries to that region what has always been deemed necessary on the coast, proof both of competent skill and good character. The lives of the traveling public should be committed to none but steady, sober men, capable and trustworthy. The object of the act is to secure the services of such and none others. There is great skill in detecting the proofs that danger is concealed beneath the surface of the water. It requires a quick, experienced, untiring eye, that sees every ripple and understands its character. We deem this an essential portion of the system of reform, and alike important to life and the preservation of property.

I have now done with the statistics which I proposed to lay before the Senate, and an account of the general provisions of the bill. I have a word or two more, however, to say to the Senate in regard to this subject, and then I shall leave the bill with them.

This bill has been long under the consideration of the Committee on Commerce. I have occasion personally to know that a very extensive correspondence has been carried on with all parts of the country interested in steam navigation, and there have been laid before the committee a great multitude of memorials, doings of chambers of commerce, of boards of trade, of conventions, of bodies of engineers; and, to a considerable extent, of all persons interested, in one form or another, in steamers. They all come to Congress to complain of the existing state of things. And in one thing, I believe, they are all, from high to low, from little to great, agreed—that is, that the present system is erroneous, and needs correction—that there is a habit, especially upon the western waters, of carrying steam to a dangerous height, which ought to be corrected. Among all the papers which have come to my knowledge, and among all the persons with whom I have conferred, I believe there is no exception to this statement. They, one and all, think it expedient that Congress should take the subject up, and should reduce the pressure allowed on steamers employed in that region of country.

You are aware, sir, that a bill was reported at the last session of Congress containing many of the provisions which are contained in this bill. It was taken up, but was not finally acted upon. The subject was taken up at an early day in this session, and the committee early reported this bill. The Senate ordered some five or six hundred extra copies of the bill to be printed for distribution, that the country might be informed of its character and its contents. I took what pains was in my power to circulate it, to make it known everywhere, but more especially to make it known in the regions most interested in it. And if gentlemen there did not receive copies of the bill, and were not made acquainted with its contents, I have only to regret that my efforts failed to bring it to their notice. But it has been brought to public attention there. It has received great attention in that portion of the country. It has been everywhere more or less discussed in the press. It has been examined with careful criticism by many individuals. There has been in this city during the whole winter a number of experienced engineers looking after the interests of that portion of the country. There are standing behind me now several of those gentlemen of very great experience, who have been long engaged in steam navigation in some capacity or other—some of whom have grown grey in that service, who are gentlemen of great intelligence. They come here, as representatives of a large convention, to make known their wants and their wishes upon this topic. We have sat down around the table; we have discussed this subject; we have examined it day after day; and I am able (which is to me a very great degree of satisfaction) and authorized to announce to the Senate, that all the gentlemen who have come here to look after these interests are satisfied with the bill, or will be satisfied with it when it receives the amendments which I intend to propose before I sit down. It is this chiefly that I wished to communicate to the Senate. If Senators are satisfied that the bill has undergone this careful criticism by men of very large experience, by men deeply interested in its provisions, who say—after examining it in convention, after examining it in their chambers, after looking it over and scanning and weighing and considering all its provisions—that they are satisfied with it, it seems to me that they must admit that it is seldom in the power of any gentleman to produce before the Senate any more satisfactory evidence of the character of a bill.

I did not expect, when the bill was ordered to be published, that it was perfect. I know enough of this subject to know that it was a very complicated one; that it was full of embarrassments. I did not suppose at that time that the work was complete. I therefore continued, as I received communications from time to time from one source and another source, sometimes by letters, sometimes by newspapers, sometimes by conference with individuals, to correct one imperfection after another as I went on. After I shall propose the large number of amendments which I intend to offer, the fundamental principles of the bill will remain substantially as they are. I do not say that some of these amendments, which are made necessary by facts, the existence of which were unknown to me at the time of drawing up the bill, are very material; but at the same time I consider them indispensable.

With these remarks I will proceed to offer those amendments to the bill which have struck my own mind as important, and the most of which, or many of them, at least, are such as have grown out of the conferences to which I have referred. There are many that are merely formal which are designed to carry out more accurately the provisions designed to be put in force. The first amendment which I propose to offer is to insert in the second section, after the word "engines," the words "appointed under the provisions of this act," so as to read "that it shall be the duty of the inspectors of the hulls of steamers and the inspectors of boilers and engines, appointed under the provisions of this act," &c.

This and numerous other amendments were submitted and adopted to carry out the views and objects to which the honorable Senator referred in his speech. Having perfected the bill as far as he deemed it desirable, amendments were offered by Mr. BRADBURY and other Senators, which will be embodied in the bill, which is ordered to be printed.

Mr. GEYER. I had prepared a number of amendments which I intended to offer to the bill. Most of them, however, have been superseded by those offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, and agreed to by the Senate. But there are some which are still necessary to give the bill effect in the western waters, which I will submit. The first is to add the following proviso to the fifth section:

Provided, however, That the inspectors may grant to any steamer engaged only in the navigation of rivers, a dispensation from the obligation to carry such life-preservers in cases where the inspectors shall be satisfied that such steamers are provided with substitutes therefor sufficient in number and properly distributed, for the purpose of saving life in case of accident.

Mr. DAVIS. That object is already covered by one of the amendments which the Senate have just agreed to.

Mr. GEYER. I will then withdraw it until the bill is printed, when I can ascertain that fact. I offer the following, to come in as an additional section after section fifth:

And be it further enacted, That every such vessel carrying passengers on the main or lower deck, shall be provided with sufficient means convenient to such passengers for their escape to the upper deck in case of fire or other accident endangering life.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEYER. The next amendment which I propose is to the sixth section of the bill. That section reads as follows:

"That no curtains made of cotton, or of any material alike combustible, shall be suspended or used in any such vessel carrying passengers, nor shall powder, oil of turpentine, or materials which ignite by friction, be carried by any such vessels as freight, and when kept on board as stores, they must be placed in metallic vessels."

I propose to strike out all after the word "passengers," and insert—

Except in state rooms or apartments where no fire or burning lights are allowed to be used; no loose hemp shall be carried on board any such vessel; nor shall baled hemp be carried on the deck or guards thereof, unless the bales are compactly pressed and well covered with bagging or a similar fabric; nor shall gunpowder, oil of turpentine, or materials which ignite by friction, be carried on board any such vessel as freight, except in cases of special license for that purpose as hereinafter provided; and all such articles kept on board as stores shall be secured in metallic vessels; and every person who shall knowingly violate any of the provisions of this section shall pay a penalty of $100 for each offense, to be recovered by action of debt in any court of competent jurisdiction.

I will explain in a few words the object of that amendment. Most of the steam vessels engaged in the navigation of the Western waters occasionally carry small quantities of gunpowder and other articles, described in that section. There is not that distinction between freight and passenger vessels that we have on the sea-board. To prohibit them entirely, where there are persons purchasing an assortment of manufactures for their stores, would be to exclude them from a very important part of the compensation which they have received from the transportation of merchandise. The amendment designs to allow the inspectors to grant a license to carry these articles; and in a subsequent section it is provided that the license shall not be granted unless the vessel is provided with metallic chests, or safes lined with metal, safely stowed at a point distant from any fire, and each of the articles packed in a separate chest, and this is intended to allow them to carry only a small quantity at a time, and have it so secure that fire cannot approach it.

Another section which I intended to propose, and which the bill did not provide for, is to prevent the taking of these articles in disguise; for it would be in vain to prohibit vessels carrying gunpowder or other combustible material so long as the practice exists, as it exists in the West, and sometimes I believe in the East, of putting up gunpowder, for instance, in some other package, as coffee, and marking it as containing coffee only, and then stow it in the vessel where fire may have access to it. The additional section I intend to propose, is to prohibit that practice, and require these articles always to be put up separately, and marked distinctly on the outside, so that where we are imposing penalties on the masters of vessels for carrying the articles, we shall, at the same time, punish those who put them up and endeavor to impose upon the masters, some of whom are now unwilling to carry them. There are many who will not receive them if they know them, or if they receive them, will stow them where there is no danger. But the practice has been adopted by some men to put up these articles in other packages in disguise. In order, therefore, that the bill may be accommodated to the condition of navigation in the West, I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not propose to make any objection to the plan of the Senator. My judgment would lead me to reject gunpowder, and articles of that description, as freight in vessels that carry passengers, on the ground that it is very explosive in its character, and unless unusual precautions are taken, I suppose every person thinks there is more or less danger to be apprehended from it. But I do not, on the other hand, wish to interfere with the trade of the people, provided gentlemen really think an arrangement can be made which will make it safe and prudent to take such articles on board. I shall make no objection to it, though my judgment would be that they had better be carried on vessels limited to freight alone.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEYER. I offer the following as an additional section:

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That hereafter all gunpowder, oil of turpentine, and materials which ignite by friction, when packed or put up for shipment or sale, shall be securely packed and put up separately from each other and from all other articles, and the package, box, cask, or vessel containing the same shall be distinctly marked on the outside with the name or description of the articles contained therein; and every person who shall pack or put up, or cause to be packed or put up, for sale or shipment, any gunpowder, oil of turpentine, or materials which ignite by friction, or shall deliver to any person any package, box, cask, or vessel, containing either of the articles aforesaid, not marked as aforesaid, or shall ship or offer to ship the same on board of any steam vessel carrying passengers, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and punished by fine not exceeding — or imprisonment not exceeding — months, or both.

The amendment was agreed to.

The following amendments, proposed by Mr. GEYER, were severally agreed to: To insert in the seventh section of the bill, which specifies the duties of the inspectors, under the second head directing them to satisfy themselves that the various parts are properly constructed, the following:

That the openings for the passage of water and steam respectively, and all pipes and tubes exposed to heat are of proper dimensions and free from obstruction; that the spaces between the flues are sufficient, and that the fire line of the furnace is below the safe water-line of the boilers.

To strike out in section seven the following:

"The said inspectors shall keep a regular record of certificates, whether of approval or disapproval; and when recorded, the originals shall be delivered to the collector; and they shall keep a like record of all appointments made under this act, and all revocations of appointments, and shall communicate to the collector all such appointments and removals."

And insert:

Upon the application of the master or owner of any steamer employed only in the navigation of rivers for a license to carry gunpowder, oil of turpentine, and materials which ignite by friction, or either of them, the inspectors shall examine such vessel; and if they find that she is provided with chests, or safes composed of metal, or entirely lined therewith, or one or more apartments thoroughly lined with metal, below the water line at a secure distance from any fire, they may grant a certificate to that effect, and authorizing such vessel to carry as freight any of the articles aforesaid, those of each description to be secured in such chest, safe, or apartment containing no other article, and carried below the water line at a distance from any fire to be specified in the certificate: Provided, That any such certificate may be revoked or annulled at any time by the inspectors, upon proof that either of the said articles have been carried on board said vessel, at a place or in a manner not authorized by such certificate, or that any of the provisions of this act in relation thereto have been violated.

The said inspectors shall keep a regular record of certificates of inspections of vessels, their boilers, engines, and machinery, whether of approval or disapproval, and when recorded, the original shall be delivered to the collector of the district; they shall keep a like record of certificates authorizing gunpowder, oil of turpentine, and materials which ignite by friction, or either of them, and when recorded, deliver the originals to said collector; they shall keep a like record of all licenses to masters, pilots, and engineers, and all revocations thereof, and shall, from time to time, report in writing their decisions on all applications for such licenses or proceedings for the revocation thereof.

In the seventh section to strike out:

"It shall be unlawful for any person to employ, or any person to serve as engineer or pilot who is not licensed by the inspectors; and any one so offending shall forfeit $100 for each offense: Provided, however, That if a vessel leaves her port with a complement of engineers and pilots, and on her voyage is deprived of their service, or the services of any of them, without the consent, fault, or collusion of the master, owner, or any one interested in the vessel, the deficiency may be temporarily supplied until the vessel returns to her port."

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

No person shall act as pilot or engineer, or be employed to serve as such, on board of any steamer carrying passengers, who has not a license for that purpose, continuing in force; and any person so offending shall forfeit $100 for each offense. Nor shall any such vessel be navigated without a competent master and a full complement of licensed pilots and engineers serving on board as such; and every person who shall violate this provision, or aid, or assist therein, shall forfeit and pay — dollars for each offense: Provided, That if any such vessel shall be deprived of the services of any such licensed officer during a voyage without the fault or collusion of the owners of such vessel, or any of them, and the deficiency shall be supplied as soon as practicable, such owners shall be exempt from the penalty aforesaid.

Mr. GEYER. The next amendment which I propose is in the twenty-sixth section. That section reads as follows:

"That the collector shall retain on file the original certificate of the inspectors, giving to the owner or master two certified copies thereof, one of which shall be placed in some conspicuous place in the vessel, where it will be most likely to be observed by passengers and others; and the other he shall retain as evidence of his lawful right to navigate the vessel, and no one shall be allowed to navigate a steamer without such certificates."

I propose to strike out all after the word "file," and insert:

All original certificates of the inspectors required by this act to be delivered to him, and shall give to the master or owner of the vessel therein named, two certified copies thereof, one of which shall be placed by such master or owner in some conspicuous place in the vessel, where it will be most likely to be observed by passengers and others, and there kept at all times, during a voyage, and while such vessel is receiving freight or passengers; the other shall be retained by such master or owner as evidence of the authority thereby conferred; and if any person shall receive or carry any passenger on board any such steamer not having a certificate of approval as required by this act, and a certified copy thereof placed and kept as aforesaid; or who shall receive or carry any gunpowder, oil of turpentine, or materials which ignite by friction, as freight on board any steamer carrying passengers, not having a certificate authorizing the same, and a certified copy thereof placed and kept as aforesaid; or who shall stow or carry any of said articles, at a place or in a manner not authorized by such certificate, shall forfeit and pay for each offense $100, to be recovered by action of debt in any court of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. WELLER. It seems to me that it would be the better plan for the Senator from Missouri to propose these amendments after the bill is reported to the Senate, and the amendments are adopted, which were agreed upon by the committee which originally reported this bill. It strikes me the better course would be to report the bill to the Senate, and after it is reported, to print the bill as amended by the standing committee which has had charge of the subject; and then, if the Senator from Missouri should desire to propose some amendments which would make it more practical in that section of country which he represents, he could propose them. Now, I confess I do not understand this bill, and I doubt whether there is any Senator here who does understand it. Thus far I have taken it with a generous confidence, relying upon the committee; but if individual Senators are to attach all sorts of amendments to this bill, I do not think I shall be able to go for it at all. I am willing to take it as the committee which had charge of this subject has reported it, but I may not be willing to take it after twenty or thirty amendments have been made by an individual Senator, without consultation with those who have had particular charge of this subject.

Mr. DAVIS. I would observe to the Senator from California, that the amendment which preceded the last one is substantially an amendment of phraseology. It proposes some little change in the character of the phraseology, and not of the substance of the provision that the Senator moved to strike out, and therefore I did not object to it. I have expressed my opinion to the Senate about this matter of carrying gunpowder, and I am called upon to record a vote on the subject. I must say, that I think a vessel carrying passengers ought not to carry gunpowder. That would be my judgment and my opinion. But this is a very simple proposition. The Senator from California will perceive that a very large proportion of these amendments relate to provisions in regard to carrying gunpowder, friction matches, and things of that sort. I would exclude them all. A large portion of the amendments relate to making provision for carrying those articles, which are either explosive in their character, or highly combustible. I think the better way would be to exclude them. I went upon that plan. But this is a proposition so easily understood by everybody, that it does not require an argument at all. A gentleman can say to himself, "Am I willing to go on board a vessel where these explosive articles are carried as freight?" If he thinks his life is safe, and the lives of his fellow citizens are safe, then he will be willing to go on board the vessel. Though these articles are so dangerous, whatever provisions we may make for their security, they will be brought on board, and if brought on board, they must be landed. If you think gunpowder is an improper article to be brought among passengers, then you will agree with me in the opinion that it ought not to be carried.

Mr. RUSK. I was extremely anxious that we should get through with these amendments to-day, so that we might have the bill printed as amended, and act on it to-morrow.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire that very much.

Mr. RUSK. I am opposed to all these amendments with regard to carrying gunpowder; and had I not noticed the great vacancy in the seats of the Senate, I should have called for a division, and discussed the question. But I thought that the better plan was to get through with the amendments and have them printed, so that they might be before us to-morrow, that we may act intelligently upon them. The great difficulty about the carriage of gunpowder is just this—one half of the destruction of human life on board steamboats occurs from the fact of the alarm that is raised the moment there is a fire. The alarm, or the fear that there is gunpowder on board, sets nearly all the passengers perfectly crazy. I venture to say, that if there was an investigation into the destruction of human life, on account of the explosions of steam-boilers, and other accidents connected with steamboats, it would be found that one half the persons who are lost have perished in consequence of a loss of judgment, occasioned by fright and their not taking the necessary steps to secure themselves. Whenever there is any powder on board a steamboat, and a fire occurs, the cry that there is powder immediately alarms the people, and an instantaneous rush takes place. It is the alarm occasioned by the presence of gunpowder which causes a great deal of the loss of life.

It is said that inconvenience would result to the merchants from requiring that boats carrying these dangerous articles should carry no passengers, but that inconvenience is nothing in proportion to the enormous risk incurred in putting gunpowder and such articles on board every passenger boat.

Mr. WELLER. There has not been on the Western waters that distinction drawn between passenger boats and freight boats that is drawn at the East. All of the steam vessels which are engaged on those waters in the transportation of passengers, likewise carry freight. For myself, I cannot see, as the Senator from Texas has said, the necessity of these amendments, with regard to the carriage of gunpowder. I do not now recollect a single instance where a boat has been destroyed upon the Western waters by carrying gunpowder. All of those melancholy accidents which have occurred upon the Western waters,—and they are far too numerous,—have not resulted from the transportation of gunpowder. As the Senator from Texas has well remarked, more lives have been lost by the terror that is produced by the alarm that there is gunpowder on board the vessel, than by gunpowder itself. The Senator from Missouri, perhaps, can tell me some instances, if any have occurred upon the Western waters, where lives have been lost in consequence of there being gunpowder on board the vessel—I mean directly.

Mr. GEYER. I do not know of any.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not know of any.

Mr. RUSK. I would mention the case of the Lioness.

Mr. WELLER. There may have been instances of this sort; but, in my judgment, the evil has not existed to such an extent as to authorize the numerous amendments which the Senator from Missouri has proposed to this bill.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] has suggested, and brought to my recollection, one example of the destruction of life by the explosion of gunpowder on board a boat. He states that the Hon. Mr. Johnson, of Louisiana, formerly a member of this body, was killed by an explosion in that way, on Red river.

Mr. RUSK. The steamboat Lioness was blown up on Red river, in consequence of having gunpowder on board.

Mr. GEYER. I apprehend that the honorable Senator from California is mistaken in regard to the object of the amendments which I have had the honor to submit. The bill, as it originally stood, prohibited, under heavy penalties, any gunpowder from being carried. The amendments I have submitted are designed to permit its carriage on certain conditions: that is, where the boats are provided with metallic safes, in which it may be stored.

In reply to the Senator from California, I may be permitted to remark, that these amendments were laid upon the table, perhaps some four or six weeks ago. Some were submitted before that time by me. Most of those which I then informally submitted have been incorporated into the amendments made on the motion of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. I will state the design of the amendment which is now pending. The twenty-sixth section of the bill directs that the inspector's certificate be placed in some conspicuous place in the vessel. This proposition is to amend that section, by providing that the license for carrying these combustible materials shall also be placed and kept in a conspicuous place in the vessel, so that every person who goes on board a vessel will know that there must be exposed the certificate under which she is authorized to navigate at all; and that, if she is authorized to carry gunpowder, that license must also be there. As it is designed to be kept there, a penalty is fixed for not keeping it there at all times when the vessel is receiving passengers, and they are on board. The object of this is to prevent parties from evading the law, by putting up the certificate, and then taking it down, and thus concealing it from the passengers.

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. GEYER. I offer the following, to come in as additional sections after the 26th section:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That every inspector who shall certify falsely touching any such vessel propelled in whole or in part by steam, and carrying passengers, her hull, accommodations, boilers, engines, machinery, or their appurtenances, or any of her equipments, or any matter or thing contained in any certificate signed and sworn to by him, shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding — dollars, or imprisonment not exceeding —, or both.

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That if any such vessel carrying passengers shall be navigated without a certificate, as required by this act for that purpose, or having such certificate, shall not at all times during the continuance thereof have her hull, accommodations, boilers, engines, machinery, and their appurtenances, and all equipments, in all things conformable to such certificate, the master or commander by whom she shall be so navigated, shall be punished by fine not exceeding — dollars, or imprisonment not exceeding —, or both: Provided, That such master or commander shall not be liable for loss or deficiency occasioned by the dangers of navigation, if such loss or deficiency shall be supplied as soon as practicable.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEYER. I propose the following, to come in at the end of the bill:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That the district inspectors appointed under the provisions of this act, shall, within their respective districts, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, take the examination, or receive the statements in writing, of persons of practical knowledge and experience in the navigation of steam-vessels, the construction and use of boilers, engines, machinery, and equipments; touching the form, material, and construction of engines and their appurtenances; the causes of the explosion of boilers, and collapse of flues, and the means of prevention; the kind and description of safety-valves, water and steam-gauges or indicators; equipments for the extinguishment of fires, and for the preservation of life in case of accident, on board of such vessels, and all other means in use or proper to be adopted, for the better security of the lives of persons on board vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam; the advantages and disadvantages of the different descriptions of boilers, engines and their appurtenances, safety-valves, water and steam gauges or indicators, equipments for the prevention or extinguishment of fires, and the preservation of life in case of accident, in use on board such vessels; whether any, and what further legislation is necessary or proper for the better security of the lives of persons on board such steam-vessels; which examination and statements so taken and received, shall be transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, at such time as he shall prescribe.

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause such interrogatories to be prepared and published, as in his opinion may be proper to elicit the information contemplated by the preceding section, and upon the receipt of the examination and statements taken by the inspectors, shall report the same to Congress, together with the recommendation of such further provisions as he may deem proper to be made for the better security of the lives of persons on board steam-vessels.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRADBURY. I move to amend the ninth section of the bill, by inserting after the words "forfeit," the words "amount of the passage money and." As the bill now stands, it provides a forfeiture of ten dollars for each passenger taken on board steamers beyond the number authorized by the certificate. This will not be, I think, an adequate penalty to prevent the abuse on long voyages, and it therefore becomes essential in the case where there has been the greatest abuse, the carrying of passengers to California, that a further penalty should be provided; and by inserting the words which I propose as an amendment, the remedy would be made more perfect.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the question was stated to be, Will the Senate concur in the amendments made in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. CHASE. I hope that the amendments will be printed, and that the bill will be postponed until to-morrow. I make that motion.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to say that I shall accede to that motion. There have been so many amendments made, that if gentlemen desire to have them printed, I have no objection provided we can get it done. But I am somewhat afraid that we cannot have them printed by to-morrow morning. Let us, however, make an effort to get them ready; and if they are ready, I hope we shall then take up the bill and dispose of it. I do not want it to be hanging here for any length of time, hence I shall be very glad to have that course taken. I would like to have it understood that the bill is to be the order of the day for to-morrow as the unfinished business.

Mr. BRIGHT. I believe that the motion is, that the bill as amended shall be printed. That is what I desire. I desire to have the bill brought to us just as it will read with the amendments which have been adopted to-day. We can then take it up to-morrow, section by section, for the purpose of making any changes that may be necessary. I think it very probable that the amendments which have been made to-day are valuable. I have no doubt of it, as the honorable Senator from Massachusetts has given the subject a great deal of attention. But I have no doubt that he will find much of the bill, as it is, that ought to be stricken out. Perhaps there may be further amendments to be added; but if the bill is to be brought to us printed as amended, we can take it up to-morrow and dispose of it without much debate.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no idea of doing it in any other way, except reprinting the bill with the amendments inserted.

Mr. CHASE. That is my motion.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I beg leave to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to one portion of the bill. I find that the fourth section of the bill, as printed, provides that there shall be a metallic life-boat for each vessel, "capable of sustaining, inside and outside, fifty persons, and having a canvas fender around the gunwale, filled with cork, of not less than six inches in diameter." I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to this fact: An amendment was suggested, I think by Mr. HENRY, of the House of Representatives, to the Senator, in the room of the Committee on Commerce, when myself and my colleague were present. He suggested the use of the words, "vulcanized India rubber float," so that it would read, "capable of sustaining, inside and outside, fifty persons, and having a vulcanized India rubber float around the gunwale;" and instead of "filled with cork," the words "inflated with air." My purpose is not to offer an amendment, but to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the subject. He is my mentor in this matter, and I take this occasion to return, as a Western man and a representative from that section of country, my thanks to him for the labor and attention which he has bestowed on this subject. He has taken a very deep interest in it. It is one worthy of his industry. I think the country owes him very much for the attention and care which he has bestowed upon the subject.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator from Iowa has very properly called my attention to that point; but if he had attended the progress of the amendments, as they were made, he would have seen that all that portion of the clause which he has read, which requires a cork fender, has been stricken out of the bill. Nor do I propose to put in what he suggests. My reason, in the first place, for striking out the provision for a cork fender was, that it might compel us to take a patented float, to the expense of which I do not wish to subject the owners of steamboats. My objection to inserting the provision for a vulcanized India rubber fender of which he speaks, is precisely the same. That is a patented article. I therefore leave the question open to the inspectors, simply requiring a metallic life-boat, leaving them to decide whether there are proper floats upon it, or whether any floats are necessary.

I would here remark that I have most convincing proof in my possession that the metallic life-boat is, of all boats, the best boat that ever was put afloat. I have certificates from the commanders of the Collins line, the commanders of the steamers between New York and Charleston, and from a great many sources to that effect. When I bring to the knowledge of the Senate one single fact in regard to these boats, testified to by the commander of the steamer Northerner, I think it will be seen how important they are. He states, in his communication to me, that when that steamer was put into the business, she had some three or four wooden boats, together with one metallic life-boat. His statement is, that the wooden boats have long since disappeared, and that the metallic boat has been in constant use, answering all expectation, and, as far as he can see, is as good at this day as when she was put into the water. If exposed to the sun she will not leak. Now, I never yet saw a wooden boat that would not leak if her bottom was exposed to the sun. The advantages, in my opinion, are such, that the moment the public become acquainted with the metallic boat they will take it, out of economy and from choice. But I do not wish to force them to take a patented article. I therefore leave them to take the cork float, the vulcanized float, or any other float they see fit, the inspectors having ample power over the subject.

The motion of Mr. CHASE was agreed to.
And then, on motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 7, 1852.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MAIL ROUTES.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the consideration of joint resolution No. 9, establishing certain mail routes. The pending question is a motion to recommit the resolution.

On motion by Mr. HAMILTON, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House the petition and papers of Ann Marie Baldwin.

Mr. OLDS. I withdraw the motion submitted by me yesterday to recommit joint resolution No. 9.

The SPEAKER. The question then recurs upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] to insert after the word "roads," in the fourth line, the words, "or public highways."

Mr. STUART. Yesterday it was stated it would be necessary to add another amendment to this resolution, in order to obviate the necessity for advertising, which now exists under the law; otherwise it might, perhaps would, be necessary for the Postmaster General to advertise for mail service on every public highway within the United States. I have drawn up an amendment, which I propose to offer at the proper time. It provides that, "hereafter the Postmaster General shall not advertise for mail service on any new post road, unless in his opinion the service shall be necessary and proper."

I think, with the amendments I have now proposed, and the one I intend to submit, every feasible objection to the proposition will be answered.

Mr. SMART. I hope, Mr. Speaker, this amendment will not be adopted. I view the proposed change as a very grave matter; and I trust the House, on the spur of the moment, will not concur in it. I understand the proposed amendment to give the power to the Postmaster General to establish mail routes and to contract for mail service on all the highways within the United States. Now, I ask gentlemen to look at the present power of the Postmaster General. He has now the power to establish offices everywhere, great and small. He has also the power to put service on roads everywhere where the law has declared them to be mail routes. Well, that power is now enormous. It is greater than that in the possession of the head of any other Department. The Postmaster General has the power to appoint twenty thousand postmasters, and to order service on all the routes now declared routes by law; and that power, I think, is sufficient for the head of any one of the Departments under the Government.

A VOICE. He has also the power to establish post offices.

Mr. SMART. And also, as I have already remarked, he has the power of establishing post offices. Why, sir, I hear the argument advanced in support of the amendment, that it will be convenient—that it is inconvenient for Congress to legislate on this subject.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I wish to ask the gentleman the question, by way of information, whether the law, as it now stands, does not authorize the Postmaster General to establish new routes where the old ones would not defray expenses?

Mr. SMART. I understand what are called special routes may be established by the Postmaster General. But, as I was going on to say, this argument that it is inconvenient to legislate, may apply to the head of every other Department. Why, the gentleman might as well propose to invest the Secretary of the Treasury with the power to lay taxes to relieve this body of the onerous labor of enacting a tariff. He might as well propose to invest the Secretary of War with the power to declare war. He might as well propose to invest the Secretary of the Navy with the power to provide for the Navy. That would be very convenient, but not very salutary to the country. I say, then, this is a grave and important question—the surrendering of the very last vestige of power which Congress has over this matter of post offices and post roads. The Constitution of the United States has conferred the power on Congress to establish mail routes; and I insist we should not delegate it to a single man. The Executive power of this Government is already enormous; and, for one, I intend, while I have the honor of a seat upon this floor, always to raise my voice against throwing any more power from the Legislative to the Executive Department of the Government. I repeat, this is a grave matter; and I trust this Congress will not surrender the last hold it has on the control of this tremendous branch of the Government.

Mr. STUART. I confess myself, sir, not a little surprised at the alarm which has taken hold of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. SMART,] and I am as much surprised at the position he takes as at the entire want of his facts to sustain it. Congress, under the Constitution, has the power to establish post offices and post roads. That is all. Now, can any gentleman raise in this House a proposition to take back the power which Congress has conferred upon the Postmaster General to establish post offices? Would we think it a conservative measure to withdraw that power now, to exercise it by Congress to legislate to establish every post office in the United States? And yet, sir, here is the provision—"to establish post offices and post roads." Has this authority, since it has been delegated to the Postmaster General, been abused to any great extent? Is there any gentleman here that can point out the instances in which this power has been abused? or has it operated with entire convenience and most properly? I ask gentlemen to say which in their opinion would be the best depository of this power for the public interests, to have our post offices established in the United States by Congress, or to have them established by the Postmaster General? How would the power be best exercised? I apprehend there can be but one response to the inquiry. I wish to state the amendment I have proposed for adoption, because there seems to be a studious effort on the part of the opponents of the amendment to pervert its language, and then to argue upon that perversion. They say it confers upon the Postmaster General the entire authority to establish post offices and post roads. Not at all. The amendment itself establishes post roads on every public highway within the United States. It leaves no discretion in the Postmaster General whatever; but it simply declares every public highway in the United States to be a post road. What then, sir? Why, the present law requires that the Postmaster General shall advertise for service on every post road established by Congress.

Then I propose an additional amendment, declaring that he shall not advertise for mail service upon any new post road unless, in his opinion, it is necessary and proper. Now, I ask again, Mr. Speaker, and call the attention of gentlemen of this House to the question, Which is the safest depository of this discretion, the Congress of the United States to say where mail services shall be placed, or the Postmaster General? If Congress is applied to, the application is made about thus: How does the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads operate? Why they employ a clerk, and they direct him to draft into a bill every single application made, without exception. Can they do it any better? Can they exercise that discretion any safer? Certainly not, sir! Suppose the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads should undertake to determine the necessity of establishing a new post road, what evidence will they have before them? Nothing but the petition. What evidence can they get before them?

Mr. FOWLER. With the gentleman's permission I will make a remark. The gentleman is not entirely correct in stating the course of proceeding with this business in the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. Every one of these petitions are distributed among the members of the committee first. It is the duty of the member having one to consider it, and to make inquiries of the member representing the country through which the road is proposed to pass, and others, as the case may be, before he reports to the whole committee in favor, or otherwise, of the road proposed. It is not in the hands of the clerk, but in the hands of some one member of the committee, who reports thereupon to the whole committee, and they concur or nonconcur in the report.

Mr. STUART. I know what the gentleman from Massachusetts has just stated to be true; but I submit, Mr. Speaker, to that gentleman whether or not what I said was not substantially correct? A member of Congress receives a petition for a new post road. He refers it to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. It is there referred to a sub-committee consisting of one of its members. That member inquires—where? Why, he inquires of the very member that introduced the petition, and that is the best information he can get. That member says it is necessary to establish the route, and it is done. And as I said on yesterday, I now venture to repeat, that in the last quarter of a century, there has not been an application denied—not one. If there were to be an essential change there might be some ground for argument such as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. SMART] adduces here; but is not the putting of service on the mail routes now given to the Postmaster General? Congress establishes the routes; but when the routes are established, he exercises his discretion whether he will put on the service or not. If the bid is not such as to fall within the probable receipts from the post offices, or pretty near it, he will not establish service of any grade. If a two-horse coach service be asked for, and the receipts will not probably sustain more than a horseback mail route, he will put on the horseback mail route. The whole thing is within his discretion and under his judgment, and this does not propose to change it one particle. It does not take from the House one single power they now possess, to transfer it to the Postmaster General. It simply does this: It stops the necessity of future legislation to determine what shall be post roads, and nothing else.

Now, I submit when these applications are never denied; when they are never the subject of inquiry here; when the whole post route bill, of whatever dimension in length the committee may find it necessary to make it, is passed through this House without division every session; when nobody will look into it except to see whether his road is in; when no one contests the routes—whether this enormous labor shall, year after year, be repeated for fear that the Postmaster General will put the service on a route somewhere where that service ought not to be. Now, has it ever been done? Can a gentleman rise in this House and say mail service is enormously and improperly put upon a mail route? Has any gentleman's experience ever ascertained any occasion of this sort? I confess, Mr. Speaker, I have never heard of it. I conceive this alarm in regard to the encroachments of the power of the Executive officers on the duties of Congress is an alarm which seems to me without the slightest foundation. If I believed any such consequences as those indicated by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] on yesterday, and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. SMART] to-day, were to follow the placing of these two or three roads in this bill, I would be among the first to oppose it.

[A message was here received from the Senate by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., its Secretary, notifying the House of the passage by that body of certain bills, and requesting their concurrence therein.]

Mr. STUART resumed. I said, if I supposed any such consequences were to follow from this amendment as indicated by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] and the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. SMART,] I would be among the first to oppose it. I would be as tenacious as any other gentleman in clothing Executive officers with discretionary power. But from the best examination which I have been enabled to give this subject, I can see no evil growing out of it. We have seen none of it yet. This discretion has been held for years—I know not how long; but it has ever been properly exercised. There can be no instance indicated where the power has been improperly exercised; and if it has not been, it is the best evidence in the world that it never will be. I would much rather trust the discretion of any Postmaster General for putting mail service upon a route, with the present imperative law upon him to advertise every one of them, than to trust to the mode in which Congress establishes mail routes. I know that in my district there were established three routes over the same region of country, and a portion of the way they were the very identical routes by different names, and the Postmaster General advertised three distinct routes. The consequence was, that they could not get either put in operation. I spent three months in correspondence with the people at home, and in making applications to the Post Office Department here, before I could get the thing into shape, and before I could get mail service upon it, and it was only a horseback mail at that.

Mr. ORR. Will my friend from Michigan [Mr. STUART] allow an interruption? I agree with him in the view that no evil would grow out of this amendment, so far as putting service upon the road is concerned. There is another question which strikes me, and it has struck me for the first time this morning. I think there is a good deal of consequence to be attached to it, and the House ought to understand it before voting. If Congress passes this amendment, that every public highway in the United States shall be declared a post route, I desire to inquire of the gentleman if that act of Congress would not prohibit your county commissioners, and the commissioners of public roads, from ever closing up any public highway that may be in existence at the present time?

Mr. STUART. I have no difficulty whatever in answering that question. I have no hesitation in saying that the local authorities would not possess the power of closing up a mail route absolutely.

Mr. ORR. Suppose there is no service upon it, it is declared a post route.

Mr. STUART. I undertake to say that the establishment of it as a post road, without putting any service upon it, would not interfere with the right of the States. The difficulty consists in the State interfering so as to prevent the passage of the United States mail. That they cannot do. This power in the Constitution to establish post offices and roads is a power paramount to all State authority. No State authority can interfere with Congress in establishing a post road, and putting mail service upon it, so as to prevent the transmission of the United States mail over that road. That is a very clear proposition; I take it from the Constitution itself. If there were no mail service upon the road, there would be no such constitutional objections at all. The practical effect of it is this: It is an everyday occurrence in a new State to alter a highway, which is a post road, declared to be so by the Congress of the United States, and the commissioners of highways are applied to take up a portion of that road and change it so as to carry it half a mile or a mile around to get around somebody's farm. If they think the local interests there require it they make the change; but that does not prevent the transmission of the United States mail. It only makes it necessary, having changed the route, that you shall go half a mile or a mile further to carry it. That is the practical effect of it.

Mr. OLDS. Will the gentleman allow me to make a single suggestion? The laws establishing post routes do not fix the road the whole distance, but merely establishes certain points on the roads. Between these points the road may be changed, as a matter of course, and the termini are always the same.

Mr. STUART. Precisely so. The route, to illustrate, may run from Kalamazoo to Paw-Paw and St. Joseph's, taking three places in my district. How does it run? It runs upon the most direct public road. You can change it, but I take it that nobody would think of so taking up the public highway that you cannot get into Kalamazoo. Would any one think of taking up all the public thoroughfares leading into the city of New York, so that no one could travel in them? The particular points on a route, it is true, are fixed. The effect of making every public highway a mail route is the one to which I alluded yesterday—and that is this. In the old States it would be of no consequence, but in the new States it frequently happens that there is a change of business. A little village springs up in the first place when a county is first settled, and twenty or thirty individuals get in there, and Congress makes a post road. Perhaps in two years the business of that county is entirely changed, and it has gone off six, eight, or ten miles east, west, north, or south, and they desire a change of the mail. Almost all the inhabitants of the county petition for it. But the Postmaster General tells you that he cannot direct the contractor to go to your new grown-up village, because there is not a post road there. What then? You must apply to Congress to make a new post road, running across an angle of four or five miles, and then the Postmaster General can do an act which the convenience of the people imperatively demands, and he cannot do it until then. The effect of my amendment will be to give him the power, whenever the public or local interest would be subserved by it, to change the route. I undertake to say that this convenient, practical result would be reached by the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. SACKETT. With the consent of the House I will present one or two practical objections to this plan, and one is a constitutional question. I am not so certain that the measure may be constitutional. I suggest this difficulty. By the Constitution we are to establish offices and roads. We are to declare what shall be a post road, not depending upon any condition or upon the legislation of the States—not to be destroyed or made effectual by the legislation of any other power. We are to establish a post road. Now, is it an execution of the provision of the Constitution to declare that to be a post road which depends upon the legislation of the States to make it such? I question whether that is an execution of the constitutional provision in regard to the establishment of post roads. I have another objection, and I ask the attention of the mover of this amendment to this subject, because I think it is a pretty serious question. It is a great difficulty in the way of this amendment. There are roads across navigable streams—streams that under the amendment would be post roads, and by the decision of the Supreme Court in the Wheeling bridge case, they being made post roads, may be made the lawful means of bridging streams to the great injury of commerce. Is it intended by this provision that roads and bridges may be made across the Ohio, Mississippi, and other rivers? If any of these consequences may follow, I am opposed to it. I raise these as objections—objections which would be sure to be made in case of an application to Congress, and which there would be power in Congress to meet. It seems to me that these two objections ought to be fatal to the amendment. There are some other objections.

Now, the Postmaster General has the power of establishing post offices in the United States. This places beyond the reach of Congress any limitation upon that power. There are some 20,000 post offices already, and if every road in the United States is to be a post road, we shall see applications for new offices multiplied, and the Post Office Department will be swamped and bankrupted by post routes which Congress never would establish. Would it be a fair execution of the commercial power for the improvement of rivers and harbors, to give the Treasurer of the United States the power of expending a certain sum of money upon every harbor, that the Legislature of a State shall declare to be a harbor? That is precisely a parallel case. Would that be a fair execution of the power of Congress upon that subject? The Congress of the United States has a right to support armies. Would it be a fair execution of the power of Congress upon that subject to lend its support to such an army as a State by their Legislature should declare to be an army, and making that support dependent upon the legislation of a State? I think not. So it is with all the powers of Congress over the rights delegated to it. It would not be a proper and legitimate execution of these powers to make their execution depend upon other legislation than our own. I think, inasmuch as the Constitution of the country has devolved this power over post roads upon Congress, they should exercise it as they would exercise the other powers of Congress. When a case is presented justifying the execution of power, then they should execute it, but not in so general terms as not to know whether it is a necessary execution of power or not. I am for the execution of power whenever it is necessary and proper—this is our duty. But until it is necessary to be executed, it is our duty to refrain from executing it. For these reasons I object to this general provision.

Mr. COBB. I suppose we have heard quite enough to satisfy the House how we should vote upon this question. And I think the best speech I can make is to call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The question being on the amendment of Mr. STUART,

Mr. SMART demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. OLDS. I have the right, I believe, to say a few words.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has.

Mr. OLDS. I do not propose to detain the House ten minutes upon this subject. I am opposed to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] and I shall state my reasons for that opposition very briefly indeed. The Constitution confers upon Congress the power to establish post offices and post routes. You have given, by the law of Congress, power to the Postmaster General to put service upon a mail route after it has been established by Congress, or to withhold that service. Now then, sir, our Government is a government of checks and balances, and here you have the check by Congress upon the Post Office Department, and the check of the Post Office Department upon Congress. I purpose to advert for a single moment to the statement made by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] that all applications to Congress are granted. Now, sir, it may be true, or it may not be true. What is the process by which you obtain a post road? A member of Congress presents a petition, which is referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. It does not follow as a matter of course that the petition is granted.

But the gentleman from Michigan says that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads report favorably upon the petitions. Now, what is the process? In all cases they place the responsibility upon the member presenting the petition. They suppose, as a matter of course, that being acquainted with the locality he knows the necessity for mail service or mail routes; and in all cases the question is put to him, "will you take the responsibility of the establishment of the post route?" But, sir, he may for partisan purposes, or for the sake of his own popularity perhaps, induce the establishment of a post road where service is not necessary. There is then a check upon that. Where? Why, in the Post Office Department. The Postmaster General can withhold the service. He is, therefore, a check upon the member of Congress. But suppose you declare all roads post routes, and then leave the power discretionary with the Postmaster General, there is no check upon him at all. Suppose he thinks fit to make his Department an electioneering machine, and holds out inducements all over the country, that he is willing to put service on every road, for the purpose of increasing the power of his party, you have no check upon him. As it is now, Congress has a check upon the Department, and the Department has a check upon Congress.

Then, sir, you will have no check upon his expenditure. Suppose he chooses to make his Department an electioneering machine, and he does really put service upon all these roads in the country: where is the limitation to his power? Where is the check to the expenditure he may think proper to make? But now you have a check upon that in the Congress of the United States. It appears to me, sir, that what I have said in regard to this fact is sufficient to prevent this Congress from granting away thus indiscriminately this power.

Why, sir, this is not a new move in Congress. For the last fifty years they have been making just such moves as this. It was made during the last Congress, and for the reasons I have assigned was voted down; and I hope it will be voted down in every succeeding Congress. I trust this amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. ORR. Before the gentleman concludes I would like to inquire of him if he has directed his attention to the point I suggested to the gentleman from Michigan? [Mr. STUART.] I do not think the gentleman from Michigan answered that suggestion. This question is a new one to me, certainly. I am satisfied from the little reflection I have been able to give to it, that should Congress pass this amendment, and declare all the existing highways post routes, you would thereby take from the county commissioners and from the State authorities, all control over every road in the United States. I desire to inquire of the gentleman if he has directed his attention to that point?

Mr. OLDS. The gentleman from Michigan said, in reply to that inquiry, that they would have no more power than they have now, because, he says, when you make post routes now the county commissioners may change the location of the road. Now, that does not at all meet the question raised by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ORR,] which appears to be a very valid one. Now, you establish a post route, but not over a particular road, and it does not prevent the change of that road. You establish certain points upon that route; those points must be adhered to, but the road may be changed between those points. But suppose you make a particular road a post route, can you change it then? Under the existing laws you can, because you designate the points; but you permit a change of the roads. If you fix the roads, then you leave the State authorities, or the county commissioners, no authority at all to change that route.

Mr. LETCHER. Before the gentleman concludes, I would wish to address an inquiry to him. I understand that this joint resolution proposes to declare all plank roads post routes, and that you object to this amendment because it proposes to make roads which are not plank roads post routes. What I want to know is the difference in principle between plank roads and other roads?

Mr. OLDS. My answer is simply this: It appears to me to be plain, that where you make a plank road the same as where you make a railroad, it becomes a public thoroughfare—a permanent public thoroughfare. You do not alter a railroad between the postal points, and so with a plank road. It therefore becomes a great public thoroughfare, and there is no danger in permitting the Post Office Department to put on service. They will have no power to make an electioneering scheme by putting mail service on roads of inferior importance, and which are not general thoroughfares.

Mr. LETCHER. Another inquiry I should like to address to the gentleman. The principle now is, that these plank roads are general thoroughfares. Now, dirt turnpikes are also general thoroughfares, throughout my part of the country at least, to a much greater extent than plank roads. Why does not the gentleman propose to make dirt turnpikes—which are the thoroughfares of the larger portion of the Union—mail routes, as well as plank roads, which are general in the Northern country?

Mr. OLDS. I should like to know if there are any of those turnpikes in the gentleman's country which are not mail routes?

Mr. LETCHER. Yes, sir, there are.

Mr. OLDS. Then you can make application to Congress to have them made mail routes.

Mr. STUART. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OLDS] one or two questions. I wish to test these constitutional arguments, as applied to this question, which I shall do in a very few words. It is said, if you establish a postroad over a public highway, that you take from the State all authority to change it. Now, sir, here is a bill making all plank roads in the United States post routes. By an existing law, every railroad in the United States is a post road; and in many of the States, the Legislatures have retained the power to repeal the charters of those railroads whenever they please. Now, will any gentleman rise here and tell me, that by the passage of this joint resolution making these plank roads post roads, you will take from the Legislatures of the States the power to repeal? If not, then you will not, by the adoption of my amendment declaring public highways post routes, take from the States the power to change those routes, through their constituted authorities, as will best subserve the public interests.

Mr. MILLSON. I imagine there is little difficulty in knowing what a railroad is, and as little difficulty in knowing what a plank road is. But let me suggest to the gentleman that there may be very great difficulty in understanding what a public highway is. Sir, it is a matter sometimes of protracted litigation to ascertain what is a public highway. Sometimes the use of a road for twenty years is regarded as evidence of a prior dedication. The owner of a road is sometimes presumed to have made a grant to the public after an uninterrupted use of twenty years. I ask the gentleman if the Postmaster General is to be authorized to determine such litigated questions, and decide for himself when a road may have been dedicated by the proprietors to the use of the public, so that it becomes a public highway?

Mr. STUART. I find no difficulty at all in answering that question. The Postmaster General advertises for mail service from one point to another—to take, as an illustration, to carry the mail from the county seat of one county to the county seat of another, and so on ad infinitum. Now, sir, there can be no objection raised that there is no post route between these two places. There can be no objection to his letting the service because all the public highways are post routes. Now, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] inquires, Will there not be a difficulty, and will not the Postmaster General be called upon to determine what is a public highway? Not at all, sir. He advertises for service between each particular point, and the mail contractors go on to execute that service under his contract. But the parties are litigating to see whether it is a public highway. Suppose they determine it is not—

Mr. SMART. I wish to inquire if the previous question has not been ordered?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. STUART. I was speaking by the leave of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. OLDS.]

Mr. SMART. I understood the gentleman from Ohio to have yielded the floor entirely.

Mr. STUART. I am not speaking to gratify myself at all, and I am perfectly willing, if the House desire it, to stop at once.

Mr. SACKETT. I move to lay the whole subject upon the table.

A MEMBER. Oh, no! that will carry the joint resolution as well as the amendment.

Mr. SACKETT. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. LETCHER. I renew the motion to lay the whole subject upon the table. The resolution ought to be defeated.

The question was then taken upon the motion, and it was decided in the negative.

So the House refused to lay the joint resolution upon the table.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, if the passage of this resolution, in his estimation, will supersede the necessity of hereafter passing post route bills?

Mr. OLDS. I am utterly unable to answer that question, for I do not know what construction the courts of the United States or the Departments may put upon the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan. If all the roads now in existence, and all that may hereafter be made, are made post routes, I do not think Congress will have anything more to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was then taken upon agreeing to Mr. STUART's amendment, declaring all highways post routes; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 65, nays 100; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abernethy, William Appleton, Ashe, David J. Bailey, Bennett, Bibbighaus, Bissell, Bowie, John H. Boyd, Brenton, Briggs, Buell, Burrows, E. Carrington Cabell, Caldwell, Lewis D. Campbell, Thompson Campbell, Chandler, Clingman, Cobb, Conger, Cullom, Curtis, Doty, Durkee, Edgerton, Fitch, Freeman, Henry M. Fuller, Gentry, Giddings, Goodrich, Gorman, Green, Grey, Grow, Sampson W. Harris, John W. Howe, Hunter, Letcher, Lockhart, Molony, Henry D. Moore, John Moore, Nabers, Newton, Outlaw, Samuel W. Parker, Penniman, Perkins, Powell, Reed, Ross, Seurry, Snow, Benjamin Stanton, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Stone, St. Martin, Stuart, Thurston, Welch, Wells, and Yates—65.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, Charles Allen, Allison, Averett, Babcock, Beale, Bell, Bragg, Brooks, George H. Brown, Burt, Busby, Joseph Cable, Carter, Chastain, Churchwell, Daniel, George T. Davis, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Dimmick, Duncan, Eastman, Evans, Floyd, Fowler, Thos. J. D. Fuller, Gaylord, Gilmore, Goodenow, Hamilton, Harper, I-sham G. Harris, Haven, Hendricks, Hubbard, Hillyer, Holladay, Horsford, Houston, Howard, Thomas M. Howe, Jackson, Jenkins, Andrew Johnson, John Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, Preston King, Kurtz, Mace, Mann, Edward C. Marshall, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, McCorkle, McMullin, McNair, McQueen, Milson, Miner, Morehead, Morrison, Murphy, Murray, Olds, Orr, Andrew Parker, Peaslee, Penn, Phelps, Polk, Richardson, Riddle, Robbins, Robie, Sackett, Savage, Schermerhorn, Schoolcraft, Schoonmaker, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smart, Smith, Abraham P. Stephens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stratton, Strother, Taylor, Townshend, Wallace, Wallace, Ward, Watkins, Wilcox, Williams, and Woodward—100.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The joint resolution was then ordered to be read a third time, and was subsequently read the third time and passed.

Mr. FOWLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON obtained the floor.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Alabama allow the Chair to inform the House that there are quite a number of communications from the Executive Departments of the Government, which it would be well, perhaps, to distribute among the several committees? If there be no objection on the part of any member of the House, the Chair proposes to present them.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am willing, if it does not take up too much time, that they shall be distributed as proposed by the Chair, but I shall object, if it is to consume the entire day.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

There being no objection, the Speaker laid before the House the following communications, which were referred to the committees indicated below:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

By an act of Congress, approved on the 10th day of February, 1852, an appropriation of $6,000 was made for the relief of American citizens, then lately imprisoned and pardoned by the Queen of Spain, intended to provide for the return of such of the Cuban prisoners as were citizens of the United States, who had been transported to Spain, and there pardoned by the Spanish Government.

It will be observed, that no provision was made for such foreigners or aliens as were engaged in the Cuban expedition, and who had shared the fate of American citizens, for whose relief the said act was intended to provide. I now transmit the report from the First Comptroller, with accompanying papers, in which it will be perceived that fifteen foreigners were connected with that expedition, who were also pardoned by the Queen of Spain, and have been transported to the United States, under contract made with our consul, at an expense of $1,013 34, for the payment of which no provision has been made by law. The consul having evidently acted with good intentions, the claim is submitted for the consideration of Congress.

MILLARD FILLMORE.

On motion by Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

II. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Light-house Board in reference to the matters which under the law it was contemplated should come under their superintendence.

On motion by Mr. DUNCAN, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

III. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, submitting an estimate for the salary of the district judge of the western district of Louisiana, the same having been inadvertently omitted in the annual estimates.

On motion by Mr. HOUSTON, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

IV. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Secretary of War inclosing an estimate of the amount required to complete the surveys of roads from the valley of the Mississippi to the Pacific ocean, with a request that the same might be laid before Congress, with the recommendation that the appropriation be made accordingly.

On motion by Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

V. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, calling the attention of Congress to the decision of the United States circuit court of New York as to the liability of manufacturers of any article of merchandise shipped by them for their own account to the United States, and invoiced by them below their market value, as provided for in the act of March, 1850.

On motion by Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. There was a communication a moment ago in reference to roads from the valley of the Mississippi westward, which was referred, on the motion of my colleague, [Mr. JONES,] to the Committee on Ways and Means. I think that that communication ought more properly to go to the Committee on Military Affairs, as the matters contained in it are connected with the military service of the country, and are more properly under the jurisdiction of that committee. I hope my colleague will not object.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I have no objection.

It was so ordered.

VI. A communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copies of letters respecting a claim for repaving a portion of the streets around the Mint at New Orleans.

On motion by Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HOUSTON demanded tellers; which were ordered, and Messrs. HART and CHANDLER were appointed; and the question being put, the tellers reported—ayes 82, noes not counted.

So the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. STUART in the chair.)

DEFICIENCY BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The business before the committee is the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 207, "to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1852." The hour having arrived for closing the general debate, according to the rule, the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON,] chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I regret that I am under the necessity—or that I feel myself so—of occupying any portion of the time of this committee to the delay, even for an hour, of the action of the House upon the amendments now before us, which it is of the utmost importance should be acted upon without delay—

Mr. SACKETT. I rise to a question of order. My point of order is, that the gentleman from Alabama, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, occupied the hour to which he was entitled, under the rule, upon this bill when it was in the House before, and that, under the rules, he has no right to another hour upon the amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the Senate having attached to this bill certain amendments, which have been considered by the Committee on Ways and Means, and reported back through their chairman, the chairman is entitled to an hour, under the rules, upon those amendments.

Mr. SACKETT. Under the advice of those who are more experienced than myself upon this subject, I am induced to take an appeal from that decision. It is a question of some consequence whether, every time a bill—

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order to debate the appeal.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I ask for tellers on the appeal. I think it is very clear that no one has any right to speak for more than five minutes.

Mr. BURT. I believe, and I desire to know from the Chair if I am correct, that the only matters before the committee now are the amendments of the Senate.

The CHAIRMAN. That is so.

Mr. BURT. Then those are the only matters which can be discussed?

The CHAIRMAN. Those are the only questions pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SACKETT] raises a question of order, that the gentleman from Alabama, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, is not entitled to an hour to speak under the rule. The Chair overrules the point of order. From that decision the gentleman from New York takes an appeal; and on the appeal tellers are demanded.

Tellers were then ordered.

Mr. MILLSON. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether, since this bill was last before the House, it has been committed to the Committee on Ways and Means, and a new report upon it has been made by that committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the amendments attached to the bill by the Senate were referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, who have reported them back, with a report in favor of some of them, and against others.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I ask for the reading of the rule in reference to this subject.

The Clerk read the rule, as follows:

"34. No member shall occupy more than one hour in debate on any question in the House, or in committee; but a member reporting the measure under consideration from a committee may open and close the debate."

Messrs. FOWLER and DEAN were appointed tellers.

And the question being put, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?" it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 89, noes not counted.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. HOUSTON. I regret this interruption, because I regret that there is a disposition on the part of any of my fellow-members not to hear any suggestions that I might be disposed to make in connection with the very interesting and very important subject that is before us for legislation.

Mr. MOREHEAD. Will the gentleman permit me to say, that those of us who voted in favor of the appeal did it with no feeling of discourtesy or unkindness towards him, or because of any indisposition to hear him speak, but we did it upon a construction of the rules of order.

Mr. HOUSTON then addressed the committee an hour in opposition to the appropriation for the Collins line of steamers. [His remarks will be found in the Appendix.]

The Clerk then reported the first amendment proposed by the Senate, as follows:

"Section 1, page 2: After line 21 insert—For completing the floating dry-dock at San Francisco, California, authorized by act of 3d March, 1851, $360,000; and said dock may be used for the purpose of repairing merchant ships, when not in use by the Government, in such manner, for such compensation, and upon such terms and conditions as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy."

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I have been instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the Senate amendment:

"In conformity with the provisions of the act of September, 1850, in relation to the dock, basin, and railway."

It will be remembered, that by the act of 1850, it was provided that a dock, basin, and railway should be established in California. By an amendment to an appropriation bill since that time, the basin and railway were cut off, and prohibited by the decision of Congress. In this state of things the Secretary of the Navy, after the passage of this amendment by the Senate, wrote to the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House a letter, which I handed to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, requesting them to report this amendment when they made their report upon the amendments of the Senate. I have endeavored to get that letter from the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, in order to show the views of the Secretary of the Navy, but the chairman of that committee has mislaid the letter, so that I have been unable to get it. It is not, therefore, my fault that the views of the Secretary of the Navy are not before the House at this time. But I will say that this amendment is in accordance with the views of the Secretary of the Navy as communicated in that letter. He doubted whether the act of the last session of Congress, modifying that of 1850, left to him power to make a contract by which this dock might be leased to the contractors on such terms and conditions as he might think proper. The Secretary of the Navy distinctly stated in that letter, that he believed it would be to the advantage of the Government to make such a contract upon the terms proposed by the act of 1850, and in accordance with his recommendation, this amendment was directed to be reported by a unanimous vote of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By the amendment of the Senate, as it now stands, it is possible that it might be construed to require the Secretary of the Navy to keep this dock in operation by the agents of the Government, and to employ it under those circumstances in repairing private vessels. The Secretary, in his letter, distinctly stated he conceived that to be an unwise mode of accomplishing this object. That is all the explanation I deem necessary.

That amendment, which I have offered, is in exact conformity, as I understand it, and as the Committee on Naval Affairs understood it, with the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy in his letter. As it gives him full discretion to do as he thinks just and proper, it seems to me there can be no objection to it.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I wish to know of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. STANTON,] if it is the object of his amendment to allow these contractors who built this dock for the Government, to lease it out for their own advantage, to private individuals, and to reap the benefit of such leases?

Mr. STANTON. It is not the object of the amendment to give the contractors any power at all, but to give the Secretary of the Navy the power to contract with them, for keeping the dock in repair for docking the Government vessels at all times, giving them the precedence, and giving them the privilege of using it for the repair of merchant vessels, upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Navy shall prescribe.

Mr. STEPHENS. I understand that the object is to give the Secretary of the Navy power to make a contract with these individuals, by which they may pocket all the rent; that is the whole sum and substance of the matter. I am against it, out and out; and I trust that this House will vote it down.

Mr. STANTON. I have only to say, that what I have intimated is the view of the Secretary of the Navy, as indicated in his communication to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and I have no doubt it is the best possible mode of disposing of the subject.

The amendment was then read, as follows:

Add after the word "Navy," in the eighth line, the words "in conformity with the provisions of the act of September 20th, 1850, in relation to docks, basins and railways, in California."

Mr. STEPHENS. It may not be known to the members of the House, that in 1850 there was a contract provided by law to be entered into with the contractors for this naval dock. In the appropriation bill of the last session of that Congress it was repudiated by this House, by a large majority, after discussion, and now it comes in in another little amendment, slipped in here at the tail of an amendment of the Senate, by which all that contract is to be enforced again.

Mr. STANTON. That is not the object of the amendment. The gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. STEPHENS. If it is to revive a law, the gentleman should have the law here, to show us what it is that he proposes to revive.

Mr. STANTON. It is not reviving any law. I believe the law is still in force. The Secretary, in his letter, states that he believes the law to be in force; but he desired an expression of the opinion of Congress, as he believed it was advantageous for the Government to adopt the provisions of that bill.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. STANTON] allow me to ask him whether this is not the very matter which was in controversy in the last Congress, when that Congress overruled the opinion of the Secretary of the Navy, and declared that that contract was not binding at all?

Mr. STANTON. No, sir; this matter has nothing in the world to do with that. This amendment does not revive that part of the law repealed by the action of the last session of Congress.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. It revives that part of the law which enables these contractors, as I stated before, to pocket all the rent of this Government dock. That is the part which it revives, and that is the part which I trust this House will never revive.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask that the law which the gentleman wishes to revive may be read.

The law was then read, as follows:

"For commencing the construction of a floating dry-dock on the coast of California, one hundred thousand dollars; and the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to enter into a contract for the construction, with all reasonable dispatch, of a sectional, or balance floating dry-dock, on the Pacific Ocean as he may select, of a capacity and dimensions in no respect inferior to those of the dry-dock in progress of construction at Pensacola: Provided, That by granting said contractors permission if required to prepare the materials chiefly at some harbor on the Atlantic sea board, and advancing moneys thereon, as the works progress, the said works can be completed at a sum not exceeding, by more than twelve per cent., the total amount contracted to be paid for the floating-dock, basin, and railway at the Pensacola navy-yard, with the addition thereto of what would be the cost of transportation to said coast of the said materials thus prepared, and with the reservation till the works are done of ten per cent., and the usual surety for the faithful performance of the contract; and the Secretary of the Navy shall also be authorized to enter into an agreement with the contractor, if they will keep the said works in repair, and take proper care of the same, for any given period of years, free of charge to the Government, to permit them to use the said works, during such period, on their own account, for repairing merchant vessels, when not occupied by vessels of the Navy, to which precedence shall at all times be given, on such terms as he shall deem reasonable."

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I desire to have the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. STANTON] read, and I wish to offer an amendment to it.

The amendment was again read, as above inserted.

Mr. BAYLY. Is an amendment to that amendment now in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is not.

The question then recurring upon the adoption of the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. STANTON demanded tellers; which were not ordered.

The question was then put, and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BAYLY. I offer, as an amendment to the amendment of the Senate, the following, which is slightly varied from the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. STANTON:]

Add, at the end of the Senate amendment, the words "in conformity with the provisions of the act of September, 1850."

I think, sir, that the amendment which has just been voted down, has not been entirely understood. I recollect the history of that law very well. When there was a proposition to establish this floating dry-dock in California, it was represented to the Committee on Ways and Means that it was exceedingly desirable that some arrangement might be made by which this dry-dock might be used for the purpose of repairing merchant vessels on the coast of California. We all know that there are no docks there, and there are many thousand miles between California and any efficient dock. It was supposed that it might be exceedingly beneficial to our commercial marine to allow them, under proper regulations, to use this dock for the purpose of repairs, when it was not occupied by Government vessels. I think my friend from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] has not entirely understood the provisions of the law of 1850. It does not give, as a gratuity, by any means, to the builders of this dock the privilege of putting merchant vessels upon it, when not occupied by national vessels. Very far from it. But if such were the case, although it would be a great benefit to them, it would be no very great detriment to the Government, for it would not injure the dock to use it in that way. But the provisions of the law never contemplated that they were to use it to repair merchant vessels when the dock was not occupied by national vessels, as a gratuity; but, on the contrary, it conferred on the Secretary of the Navy the power to make a contract as to the terms upon which they were to do this; and one of the provisions in reference to that stipulation indicated that they should keep the dock in repair.

Well, now, I recollect that when I was a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, at the time of the construction of the Pensacola and Philadelphia docks, one great objection was offered, that a very large expenditure would be required annually to keep them in repair. The advocates of stone docks insisted that it was better to have stone docks, because repairs on them would be inconsiderable; whereas the expense of keeping in repair floating docks would be very heavy.

To relieve the Government, to some extent, from that annual charge, and to do no harm to anybody, that provision contemplated the authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to make a contract with the constructors, by which they were to be bound to keep the dock in repair, and to reimburse themselves by having the privilege of putting merchant vessels upon the dock, when not occupied by national vessels—preference, in all cases, to be given to the latter. I recollect very well I thought at the time that the provision was a very judicious one—advantageous to our commercial marine, and would work no disadvantage to the Government. I see no foundation for the objection my friend from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] has started upon this matter. I recollect very well the impression that rested upon my mind at the time.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The amendment as it comes to us from the Senate, proposed to be amended by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY,] provides that said dock may be used for the purpose of repairing merchant vessels, when not in use by the Government, in such manner and for such compensation, and upon such terms and conditions as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] proposes by his amendment that this provision in the Senate amendment shall be executed in pursuance of the act of September, 1850, which is, sir, that the Secretary of the Navy shall also be authorized to enter into an agreement with the contractor to effect this object of repairing merchant vessels.

Mr. BAYLY. Will my friend allow me to make one remark?

Mr. JONES. I cannot.

Mr. BAYLY. My views are different.

Mr. JONES. I will tell my friend the difference. The Senate amendment provides that the Secretary of the Navy may have all the American people to make his arrangements with, but with the gentleman's proposed amendment it compels the Secretary to make this agreement with the contractors who built this dock.

Now, sir, this amendment, as it comes to us from the Senate, is clear and explicit, and gives to the Secretary of the Navy full and ample authority to prescribe the conditions upon which this dock may be used for the repair of merchant ships, when not employed in repairing vessels of the Navy of the United States.

Then, sir, I can see no good to be effected by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia. It is, however, like a great deal of other legislation transacted here—not only requiring that a contract shall be made, but designating the persons with whom it shall be made.

I think, sir, that the Senate amendment gives to the Secretary of the Navy full and ample discretion and power over this subject, and is far preferable to the law of 1850, which requires him to make an agreement with the constructors of this work; and I hope the House will vote it down.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. BAYLY, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. For the purpose of reading the letter of the Secretary on this subject, I propose to strike out from the Senate amendment the words, "in such manner, for such compensation, and upon such terms and conditions as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy;" and to insert the words, "as provided by the act of September, 1850, in reference to dock, basin, and railway."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that amendment is not in order.

Mr. STANTON. It is to strike out and insert.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman proposes to insert what has just been rejected by the committee.

Mr. STANTON. That has not been rejected by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands it to be the same subject as that offered by the gentleman in the first instance.

Mr. STANTON. It is not the same provision. Besides, this is a proposition to strike out and insert. It is a different proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's amendment is not in order.

Mr. STANTON. I then move to strike out the words "in such manner, for such compensation, and upon such terms and conditions as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy."

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment is in order.

Mr. STANTON. The proposition for the construction of this basin, dock, and railway originated with the gentleman from Virginia, not now in his seat, [Mr. BOGOCCK;] and if he had been present on this occasion, this amendment would have been offered by him. It was passed by the unanimous consent of the Naval Committee, upon the distinct and unequivocal recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy. The Secretary of the Navy states his opinion—

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I call the gentleman to order. We will never get through with the bill unless the rules are strictly adhered to. The gentleman must confine his remarks to the amendment offered, as to why these words should be struck out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's comments so far have not been in order.

Mr. STANTON. I say the Secretary declares the act of 1850 is still in force. He declares that to be his opinion, and if so the words I propose to strike out are perfectly unnecessary. He contends that the alteration of the law, made at the last session of Congress, does not repeal the power given to the Secretary to make this contract with the constructor. If that be so, these words are unnecessary, and ought to be stricken out. It is true the Secretary distrusts his opinion, and asks an expression of the opinion of Congress. He says he believes it to be advisable to make this contract, and one of the reasons, not stated in this letter of the Secretary, but which I can state to the House upon information about which there can be no doubt, is, that the Government of the United States is not prepared to receive that dock. The Secretary states that the dock will be ready some time during the present year. No appropriations are made to receive it. Besides, vessels have been chartered by the contractors to carry materials for this dock in California, and they have in the freight contract a demurrage which will amount to some six or eight hundred dollars per day; which, of course, will be a charge upon the contractors if the Government is not ready to receive the dock, which the Government will be obliged to reimburse to them. Unless the Government makes some provision for the reception of this dock a very heavy charge will fall upon them. It is absolutely indispensable—

Mr. CLINGMAN. I want information. I ask the gentleman whether, under the terms of the Senate's amendment, conditions and compensation cannot be so arranged as to relieve them?

Mr. STANTON. I think so; but the Secretary of the Navy is very scrupulous. He states what he believes to be best for the Government to do, and desires Congress to express its opinion. I do not think there would be any difficulty if that amendment were not passed, if there was nothing in it on the subject; but Mr. Graham is a very scrupulous gentleman, and he does.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I ask the gentleman whether the amendment he proposes will not revive other provisions in the law which, I understand, he does not desire to have revived?

Mr. STANTON. Not at all, sir. Mr. Graham expresses the opinion that those provisions are still in force. I believe they are still in force. Any lawyer would say that they are still in force.

Mr. CLINGMAN. We attempted to repeal the law as far as we could.

Mr. STANTON. When did you?

Mr. CLINGMAN. We did not formally repeal it, but we struck out the appropriation because we did not desire it to be carried out.

Mr. STANTON. We struck out the basin and railway, but left the provisions in reference to the dock.

Mr. CLINGMAN. But I ask the gentleman whether the terms of his amendment will not revive the basin and railway?

Mr. STANTON. No, sir; not at all. If it be in order, I would like to have the letter from the Secretary of the Navy I send to the Clerk's desk, read.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I think the gentleman's time has expired.

The CHAIRMAN. It has.

Mr. STEPHENS. I wish to say, in reply to the gentleman, one thing. He says the Secretary thinks that law is still in force. If so, let him take the responsibility of acting that way. He says the Secretary is a scrupulous gentleman. I think at the last session of this Congress we passed a law that this contract should be let out to the lowest bidder. The Secretary did not do it; and it will not do for gentlemen to rise up and tell me he is a scrupulous man. Now, if he wants to, let him go and act upon the supposition that the law is still in force. I think the Secretary, if he is a scrupulous man, would have obeyed the injunction of this House and let out the contract to the lowest bidder.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. STANTON, and it was rejected.

The question then recurring on the adoption of the Senate's amendment, it was agreed to.

The second amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

"Page 2, line 23, after the word 'dollars,' in the clause providing for the temporary clerks in the office of the Third Auditor, strike out the words:

"Provided, That no clerk shall receive more than at the rate of $1,000 per annum under this act?"

And insert the following in lieu thereof:

"Which sum shall be distributed among the clerks according to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That no salary from this fund shall exceed $1,200 per annum."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to amend that amendment by inserting after the word "exceed" the words "$1,000 per annum, except two, who shall receive—" It will be seen by reference to the clause as it was sent to the Senate from the House, that the salaries of the extra clerks herein provided for were limited to $1,000 per annum. The Department asked that they might have permission to employ not exceeding two of them at $1,200 per year. I had a conversation with the chairman of the Committee on Finance of the Senate, and he said the object of this amendment was, that the Secretary might have the discretionary power to employ two of those clerks at $1,200, and the others were to be employed at $1,000 per annum. As the amendment comes to us from the Senate, they will construe it that each and every one of them is to receive $1,200 per annum. Another construction that will be given to it will be to claim for those who were employed under a former law as temporary clerks in this Department during the last year $1,200 per annum. This amendment I propose is in accordance with the original object of this amendments adopted in the Senate, as I have been assured by the chairman of the Finance Committee of that body.

The question was then taken, and the amendment to the amendment was adopted.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the amendment of the Senate as amended, and it was agreed to.

The third amendment of the Senate, proposing to insert the word "temporarily" after the word "employed," in the clause appropriating $4,000 for extra clerks in the office of the Auditor of the Post Office Department, was agreed to.

The fourth amendment of the Senate was agreed to, viz:

"For printing in books prepared for the purpose, canceled certificates of the registry and enrollments of vessels returned by the several collectors of the customs, $500."

The committee next proceeded to the consideration of the fifth amendment, which reads as follows:

"Page 5, line 95, after the clause appropriating $80,000 for running and marking the boundary line between the United States and Mexico, according to the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, insert the following:

"Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to sanction a departure from the point on the Rio Grande, north of the town called Paso, designated in the said treaty."

Mr. BROOKS. I want to propound to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HOWARD] a question, and that I may do so in order, I move to amend that amendment, by inserting after it the words:

The southern and western limits of New Mexico as laid down in Disturnell's map, published in New York in 1847, of which map a copy is added to the treaty.

I suppose that the House listened to the remarks of the gentleman from Texas on yesterday, and therefore it is not necessary for me to restate the points he made. I must confess I have not had time to examine and see how accurate they were. The amendment as printed in the bill before us, seems to provide for an alteration of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. It provides "that nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to sanction a departure from the point on the Rio Grande, north of the town called Paso, designated in the said treaty." That is one item in the treaty. I propose to add the other item, and that is in the words of the amendment submitted; so that the two parts of the treaty, that which stipulates El Paso, and that which stipulates that Disturnell's map shall be the line, shall appear. By this amendment we shall be committed to the whole, and not to a part of the treaty, as the Senate's amendment seems to propose. I am willing to stand by the treaty as it is, whatever it may be; but I am unwilling to designate a particular part of the treaty, and so to insinuate we will not stand by the whole. In my amendment I have quoted briefly the words of the treaty which I propose to append to the Senate's amendment.

There is said to be in dispute 9,000 square miles of territory. Now as this is a subject which the House have not had time to investigate, that is a good reason why we should not, in an appropriation bill, commit ourselves to an alteration of a treaty, for this commitment hereafter may be used to repudiate, repeal, or change that treaty, or it may be used as a call upon the House for some appropriation for the loss of territory. Besides, the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo stipulates that the two Governments shall each appoint a commissioner and surveyor, and the line agreed upon by them is to be deemed a part of this treaty. If it be necessary to stipulate one proviso quoting one part of the treaty, I propose to stipulate another proviso quoting the whole part of the fifth section of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. That confirms the treaty and leaves New Mexico whatever benefit there may be in this disputed boundary line—leaves it to be a question of law—or a question of negotiation between us and Mexico hereafter. But this proviso, as it stands, commits us to something, the purport of which I do not exactly comprehend. The safest way, therefore, if we must do something, is to recite in substance the whole boundary part of the treaty, and to demand the true execution of that as a whole.

Mr. PHELPS. In submitting any remarks at this time, by the rules of the House I must oppose the amendment. I do this in order briefly to express my opinion of the true boundary between this country and Mexico. We are all aware the commissioners appointed by both Governments are now engaged in running this line. It is also known there has been a dispute between the commissioner on the part of this Government, Mr. Bartlett, and the surveyor attached to our commission, about the southern boundary line of New Mexico. This commissioner is a mere Executive officer. He is no plenipotentiary authorized to negotiate a boundary for us. He is only authorized to mark out and define with the commissioner on the part of Mexico, the boundary according to the terms of the treaty which the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] has correctly quoted.

Yesterday I was desirous to obtain the floor to express my opinions on this question, but was unable to do so. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HOWARD] condemned the action of our commissioner in fixing the initial point on the Rio Grande at the parallel of latitude of 32° 22'. In this much I concur with him, but do not concur with him in the point he has designated as the true initial point. It may be said there are three points named as the initial point of the southern boundary of New Mexico. The first, the line as run by Mr. Bartlett, commencing on the right bank of the Rio Grande, in latitude north 32° 22', and 42.85 miles north of the town of El Paso. The second, the line mentioned by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. HOWARD], north of El Paso about eight miles. The third is the line for which I contend, which commences at the town of El Paso, leaving that town within the State of Chihuahua. The latitude of El Paso is stated by our commissioner to be 31° 45'. This, I presume, is the latitude of the plaza, and not the latitude of the northern confines of the town. The difference in latitude between the line as run by the commissioner, with the sanction, as I am informed, of this Administration, and the last-mentioned line, is 37'. Assuming three degrees of longitude, which I am informed is the length of the southern boundary line of New Mexico, west of the Rio Grande, as claimed by our commissioner, we lose by running the line as decided by the commissioner more than seven thousand square miles of territory—an area greater in extent than the area of the States of Connecticut and Rhode Island combined.

The treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo defines the line between this country and Mexico to be the Rio Grande, "following the deepest channel, where it has more than one, to the point where it strikes the southern boundary of New Mexico; thence westwardly along the whole southern boundary of New Mexico, (which runs north of the town called Paso,) to its western termination; thence northward, along the western line of New Mexico, until it intersects the first branch of the river Gila, (or if it should not intersect any branch of that river, then to the point on the said line nearest to such branch, and thence in a direct line to the same;) thence from the middle of the said branch, and of the said river," &c.

The same article from which the foregoing is quoted also declares, "the southern and western limits of New Mexico, mentioned in this article, are those laid down in the map entitled 'Map of the United Mexican States, as organized and defined by various acts of the Congress of said Republic, and constructed according to the best authorities. Revised edition; published at New York in 1847, by J. Disturnell.' Of which map a copy is added to this treaty," &c., &c.

The southern boundary of New Mexico is, by this treaty, made a part of the boundary between the two nations. Not the southern boundary of New Mexico resting on tradition, but the boundary as defined by the Government of Mexico itself. The southern boundary of New Mexico is laid down by geographers as the parallel of latitude of 31°. Humboldt—and I know of no better writer on the civil and political divisions of New Mexico at the time he wrote—gives the 31st degree of latitude as the southern boundary of New Mexico. But I do not rely on this author to establish my point. My inquiry is, where is the southern boundary of New Mexico? Where was it at the time the treaty was ratified? Tell me not the commissioners were to be governed by latitude and longitude, as laid down upon the map. Tell me not the commissioners were to disregard natural and fixed objects mentioned in the treaty, and the decrees of the Mexican Government, made long prior to, and in force at the date of the treaty, and let all these yield to latitude and longitude laid down upon this map. Such positions are absurd and violate plain and indisputable principles of law. The longitude of the Rio Grande, at the initial point of the line run by the commissioners, is about three degrees west of the position given it on the map; in other words, on this map, the Rio Grande, at this point, has a position about three degrees east of its true position. And who would be so reckless of his own reputation as to contend that the line between us and Mexico shall be in that longitude, which the map accompanying the treaty assigns as the longitude of the Rio Grande? All agree the Rio Grande, from its mouth to the point where it strikes the southern boundary of New Mexico, is the true boundary, called for in the treaty. It is a known, a fixed object, and one called for in the treaty. So with the southern boundary of New Mexico; it is a known, a fixed object—a call mentioned in the treaty. Every argument which can be urged to sustain the position that the Rio Grande is the true boundary between us and Mexico, notwithstanding its real position is about three degrees of longitude, or about one hundred and seventy-six miles west of its position on Disturnell's map, apply with equal force to the position, that the true southern boundary of New Mexico, notwithstanding the position assigned it on the map, is the real and true boundary between us and Mexico. If you disregard longitude when it conflicts with a natural object, so must you disregard latitude when it conflicts with a known and fixed object. Known and fixed objects control courses and distances as much as do natural and fixed objects.

There is no difficulty in the question when we apply—when we test it by those principles which every jurist recognizes. I have said the southern boundary of New Mexico is known and fixed—was known and fixed long prior to the date of the treaty—was defined not by the Spanish Government, but by the Mexican Government—was defined by a decree of the Mexican Congress, to be found on their statute-book. This line was an important political line. Important in their political organization, because it defined the limits of a Territory still more important; because that line was made, and is now, the boundary of one of the States of that Confederacy. And has this act of the Mexican Congress escaped the notice and attention of the Administration? Has the commissioner on the part of this Government been playing the part of a diplomat without being fully advised by his Government of all the authorities bearing on this question? Has he been sent there to run and mark the boundary line between the United States and Mexico, and not furnished with the evidence necessary to discharge his duties faithfully to the Government, whose agent he is? Sent there to run and mark between this nation and Mexico a boundary line which runs "westwardly along the whole southern boundary of New Mexico (which runs north of the town called Paso) to its western termination?" Has he not been apprised of the act of the Mexican Congress establishing the southern boundary of New Mexico? And having been apprised of it, has he not utterly disregarded it and its effect?

Under the Spanish Government the Province of New Biscay adjoined the Territory of New Mexico, being on the west of the Rio Grande, and on the south and southwest of New Mexico. The boundary line between the two Provinces was the parallel of latitude of 31°. I believe the boundary between New Biscay (Nueva Biscaya) and New Mexico remained unaltered by the Mexican Government until 1824.

In that year the State of Chihuahua was organized. It was admitted into the Federal Union. Its limits were in that year defined by an act of the Mexican Congress. And by that act (if the southern boundary of New Mexico was until that time the parallel of latitude of 31°) the southern boundary of New Mexico was changed. On the west of the Rio Grande the southern boundary of New Mexico and the northern boundary of Chihuahua are the same. And this is the only portion of the boundary line now in controversy. I have the decree of the Mexican Congress, to which I refer. Here it is. And I give the original with my translation, so that my translation and the original may be compared:

DECRETO.

Demarcacion del Territorio de la Provincia de Chihuahua.
El Soberano Congreso General Constituyente de los Estados Unidos Mexicanos ha tenido á bien decretar—

El Territorio de la provincia de Chihuahua lo comprendra todo lo comprendido entre las lineas rectas tiradas de Oriente á poniente del punto ó pueblo llamado Paso del Norte por una parte con la jurisdiccion que siempre ha tenido, y la hacienda de Rio Florido por el lado de Durango con su respectivo pertenencia.

Lo tendra entendido, &c.

México, 27 de Julio, de 1824.

DECREE.

Boundary of the Territory of the Province of Chihuahua.
The Sovereign General Constituent Congress of the United Mexican States has held to be well decreed—

The Territory of the Province of Chihuahua shall include all comprehended between right lines drawn from the east to the west, from the point or town called Paso del Norte on the one side, with the jurisdiction it has always possessed, and the hacienda of the Rio Florido, on the side of Durango, with its respective appurtenances.

It shall be.

México, 27th July, 1824.

The northern boundary of Chihuahua, as far as that State and New Mexico were coterminous, was the southern boundary of New Mexico, and that line is the line which it was the duty of the commissioners to run and mark. This line commences on the north of the town of El Paso, leaving that town within the State of Chihuahua. Those who drafted the treaty were aware of this boundary line, for the treaty mentions this line as being on the north of Paso; and without those words it might have been contended this line ran through the town of Paso. But this would not have been a fair construction of the act; for this act, I claim, leaves the town of Paso with its jurisdiction within the State of Chihuahua. This act of the Mexican Congress places the matter beyond dispute. It solves the whole question. It shows the point on the Rio Grande where the southern line of New Mexico touched that stream. There is no necessity of ascertaining the latitude and longitude of places laid down on Disturnell's map in order to determine the initial point of this line. It shows there is about to be a surrender of territory which as clearly belongs to us as does any portion of New Mexico.

It shows our rights have not been asserted, but, on the contrary, have been neglected and abandoned. And are we to submit to this? Are we to permit any portion of our territory to be surrendered by Executive officers, or by the Executive himself, to a foreign power?

I have sought to obtain a copy of Disturnell's map, and have one here. It appears, however, to have been published in 1848. The map referred to in the treaty was published in 1847. There is no statement that any corrections or alterations have been made on this by the publisher. I may do injustice in assuming it is in all respects similar to the map mentioned in the treaty. But if it is precisely like the map mentioned in the treaty, a bare inspection of this map will show that the line has not been run upon the southern boundary of New Mexico, as laid down on it. El Paso, on the map, is south of the parallel of latitude of 32°, and the line run by the commissioners is on the parallel of latitude of 32° 22', more than forty-two miles north of El Paso.

But I do not rest the case upon the lines laid down upon the map. The treaty declares the southern boundary of New Mexico shall be the boundary between this nation and Mexico. I have shown where that boundary is, and that the commissioners have not run and marked that boundary line upon the line mentioned in the treaty. I have briefly stated the points involved in this question. Perhaps, at some other time, I may again recur to this subject.

The question was then taken on Mr. Brooks's amendment to the amendment, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I propose the following amendment: to strike out all after the word "provided," and insert the following:

That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to sanction a departure from any other point on the Rio Grande, north of the town called Paso, than that designated in the said treaty; nor from any point on the earth's surface, north of points designated on Disturnell's map of 1847, as lying above or north of said intersection of the southern boundary of New Mexico and the Rio Grande.

The matter to which this amendment refers is of great interest and importance. Gentlemen have charged here that the Department of the Interior is throwing away valuable and extensive rights, by permitting the execution of the survey of our boundary with Mexico upon improper principles, springing from a misconception of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. Gentlemen do not appear to have agreed among themselves as to the proper mode of determining the southern boundary of New Mexico. One talks of "course and distance giving way to natural monuments upon the ground;" another brings Mexican decrees and legislative acts, whereby to prove the exact boundary according to ancient Mexican interpretation; another produces the map of 1848 to show where the line runs. Sir, these arguments are useless—monuments are of no account in this transaction, unless they are referred to in the treaty; for we made an express contract that the line should be run "according to Disturnell's map of 1847," a copy of which was attached to the treaty, signed and sealed by the high contracting parties, and is, to all intents, as much a part of the treaty of Hidalgo as any clause of that instrument. One gentleman says, the map has laid down the line in wrong latitude, and that the staked line upon the ground shows the error; another, that the fixation of the northern boundary of Chihuahua, by legislative decree, exhibits the true line. My reply is, that we have made an express contract to run the line as it is delineated on a certain map; and, regardless of decrees and natural monuments, the true line of the treaty is the line as shown on Disturnell's map of 1847, and that copy of it which is signed by the parties—no other.

The treaty establishes the line thus: "Commencing at the mouth of the Rio Grande, and running thence up the middle of the main channel of that river until it intersects the southern boundary of New Mexico." To find that point of intersection is the problem. The treaty solves it. How? By an express declaration that the southern boundary line named in the treaty, is that boundary line "as delineated on Disturnell's map of 1847," a copy of which, "signed and sealed by the parties," is attached to the treaty, and forms part of it. Nothing remains to be done, but to run that line on the earth's surface, as it is laid down on that map. If that map contains geographical errors, the treaty has consecrated them, and the United States cannot correct them now without a violation of the treaty. It is useless to produce authority to show where Mexico had formerly established the line—useless to argue that Disturnell made a mistake in compiling his map. This learning should have been possessed by the commissioner who made the treaty, or by the Senate which ratified it. It can have no force here and now. I understand the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HOWARD] to assert that Mr. Bartlett has not followed the map of the treaty, but that by taking the latitude and longitude of the point of intersection of the Rio Grande and the southern boundary of New Mexico, he has lost some seven thousand square miles of territory to the United States. I fear that a grave error may have been committed in this transfer of the point, but I imagine the commissioner has, nevertheless, followed the map. The question is, how to establish on the earth's surface the point of intersection as it is fixed upon the map of the treaty? There are, clearly, two ways of doing this.

1st. To ascertain exactly the longitude and latitude of the point (by mathematical instruments) upon the map of the treaty, and then by sidereal observations, to establish the same point on the earth's surface. This method the commissioner pursued, as I understand, and the point is thereby fixed thirty-eight miles north of the town of El Paso.

2d. Instead of determining the point by means of latitude and longitude, it might have been determined by reference to established points exhibited by the map of the treaty. Thus, El Paso is a town laid down on the map, and referred to in the treaty. We know where the town of El Paso is, on the earth's surface. The protractor would show in a moment the course of a line drawn through El Paso, and the point of intersection of the Rio Grande with the southern boundary of New Mexico, as established on the map—the dividers applied to the scale of Disturnell's map would show the distance of that point from El Paso. Taking the course by the compass, you run the distance, unless stopped by finding the Rio Grande short of it; or if you pursue the course until you exhaust the distance, and do not find the stream, the distance must be prolonged, or the natural object called for must be sought by the shortest line to it. Now, sir, as I understand, the scale of the map of the treaty shows the point of intersection as only a few miles from El Paso, and very little north of it; while the sidereal and solar observations to establish the exact latitude and longitude of the point, throw it thirty-eight miles north. The difference in establishing the initial point according to the one or the other of these methods involves a large difference in the survey; for a lap is embraced between the lines run from these points respectively, thirty miles wide, and in length extending across New Mexico. Besides, when the western boundary of New Mexico is reached by the lower line, or southern fork of the Gila, presents itself to the call of the treaty; while, by pursuing the upper line, a much greater distance on the western boundary is to be run to find a northern fork of the Gila, to answer to the call of the treaty. Of course, here again the lap of country between the forks of the Gila is to be won or lost by the method pursued in determining the initial point on the Rio Grande. It is said that the only practicable railway route to the Pacific, lies through this lap. The House will understand, then, that this presents a subject of large importance, and great interest to the United States. The conditions of the treaty are already sufficiently onerous, and I am not disposed to lose anything which belongs to us by the treaty now, in order that our children may pay to reacquire it from Mexico hereafter.

I think I understand how the American commissioner happened to adopt the idea of establishing the initial point by reference to latitude. On Disturnell's map the width of New Mexico runs through three meridians of longitude, and Mr. Bartlett determined to claim all the longitude given by the map, without reference to "natural monuments." This plan gave distance to the west, and of course made again to the United States on the long line of New Mexico. After some hesitation, the Mexican commissioner conceded the proposition that the longitude was to be measured agreeably to the map, and thus forced the American commissioner to consult latitude also in the establishment of the initial point on the Rio Grande. This, I apprehend, is the whole of the case. Now, sir, to my amendment: If Disturnell's map of 1847 calls for any town or settlement, or "natural monument," and fixes it in the vicinity of and north of the point of intersection of the Rio Grande with the southern boundary of New Mexico, our commissioner is instructed by the amendment that in establishing the initial point on the Rio Grande he must keep to the south of these towns and natural monuments. In other words, we mean that places embraced by the map as within the concessions of the treaty, shall be also embraced by the lines which he runs over the earth's surface. I do not know that in an appropriation bill we can do more than express the legislative will in regard to this matter; for we have no power to change the treaty, and cannot prevent the lines from being run, because that is stipulated for in the treaty; but we should adopt some mode of suggesting to the Department which has charge of this business, that our commissioner must not so look into the stars as to lose sight of the objects on the earth which are ours according to the treaty and the map accompanying it.

Mr. PHELPS again addressed the committee on the subject of this boundary, but has availed himself of the privilege sanctioned by custom, of combining the remarks made on this occasion with those previously made to-day. [His remarks are published in the Appendix.]

The question was then taken on Mr. MARSHALL's amendment, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia, moved to amend the amendment by striking out the words "north of the town called Paso," so as to make it read—

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to sanction a departure from the point on the Rio Grande designated in the said treaty.

Mr. J. said: Mr. Chairman, this is simply a question of construction of the compact between the two Governments, and the intent of the parties, gathered from the language of the treaty, to govern. Latitude, I believe, is not referred to. A boundary is referred to—the limits of New Mexico. The southern boundary line of the United States is to run up the Rio Grande river north of El Paso to a point where the southern boundary of New Mexico crosses the Rio Grande. That is the initial point. It is then to run westward, along the southern boundary of New Mexico, to the western limits of New Mexico, and then along the northern boundary until it strikes the first branch of the Gila river. Now, in this treaty, the natural point referred to is the river. The southern boundary of New Mexico is also referred to, and that southern boundary is to be determined and adjusted by reference to the map of Disturnell. The town of El Paso is not to govern. It has nothing to do with it; nor has latitude. The map is referred to for the purpose of showing what are the boundaries of New Mexico; and when they are ascertained, that fixes the limits of the United States. That was the intent and object of the parties, and I therefore move to strike out the words "north of the town of Paso."

Mr. HOWARD. I think it is safer to adhere to the amendment of the Senate, for this reason: that we have no right to put an ex parte construction upon the treaty, but we have a right to say that the treaty shall be adhered to, and that the treaty point shall be adhered to, and for the simple reason that the commissioners of the two Governments have no power to change it. I think, therefore, that the amendment, as it now stands in the language of the treaty, is the safest, and that it cannot give rise to any objection on the part of the Mexican Government. I think it would be safer to adhere to it as it is.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] was, in one respect, a very good provision; but the latter clause of it might have the appearance of setting up a construction of our own. It therefore seemed to me to be the safest way to adhere to the language of the Senate amendment, which is the language of the treaty.

The question was then taken upon Mr. JOHNSON's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. BROOKS. I rise to submit another amendment, on which I shall ask a division of the committee. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "from the point on the Rio Grande north of the town called Paso, designated in the said treaty," and to insert in lieu thereof, "from the true line of the treaty," so as to read:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to sanction a departure from the true line of the treaty.

This proposition commits us in nothing to the town of El Paso, in nothing to Disturnell's map; it commits us to nothing but what we ought to be committed to—the true line of the treaty; and that true line of the treaty is to be decided upon by the commissioners of the two Governments, or hereafter to be decided on by treaty between the two Governments if it cannot be agreed upon by the commissioners.

The objection I have to the designation of the town of El Paso is, that it seems to commit us to that line, and that line only; and seems to non-commit us to Disturnell's line, another essential part of the treaty. Now, there is a question which is the true line—the El Paso line, or the line of Disturnell's map. I am willing to take whichever may be the true line of the treaty; but I am not willing to commit myself here by legislation; so as hereafter to be bound by that commitment, either to the town of El Paso, or to Disturnell's line. To the true line of the treaty, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HOWARD] says, we ought to be committed; but in this House, and in this condition of the House, we are not prepared to judge what is the true line of the treaty. The danger of these commitments to particular designations lies in the claims upon us hereafter to which they give rise. Put this proviso in the appropriation bill now, and it will be cited as a precedent, as a commitment, as a pledge on the part of this Congress to stand to the line of El Paso—to go to war with Mexico, if necessary, to stand to that line—or if not to go to war, to pay to New Mexico some millions of dollars, if we cannot stand by the line of El Paso. I am not willing to be committed either to El Paso or to Disturnell's map; but I will stand by the true line of the treaty, whatever it may be, and to that line I ask the House to be committed.

If the true line of the treaty runs thirty miles south of the line that has been surveyed, we are committed to it, and pledged to stand by it. If it runs thirty miles north of El Paso line, we shall be committed to it. But this House of Representatives—the legislative power of this Government—ought not in an appropriation bill, without a proper study and comprehension of the whole subject, to commit itself to either of the lines—that of El Paso, or the line of Disturnell's map. Let us stand, then, by "the true line of the treaty."

Mr. SWEETSER. I rise for the purpose of opposing the amendment of the gentleman from New York. It seems to me that, in the discussion which has sprung up here incidentally, we cannot, by any act of ours, get at the true condition of things in relation to this boundary commission. It is well understood by some members in this House, and ought to be understood by the country, that there has been a disagreement between the commissioner, Mr. Bartlett, who is now upon the border running this boundary, and Colonel Graham, an accomplished officer of the Topographical Corps, whose services on our northeastern boundary, in former times, are well known to the country, and that said Graham has refused to act under the direction of said Commissioner Bartlett in fixing the starting point of the Rio Grande, where it seems Commissioner Bartlett has consented to have it fixed, and that in consequence of such difference of opinion, said Graham has been dismissed from the commission. Colonel Graham is one of the most accomplished and well-informed officers in the country. If we undertake to determine, by any action at this time, where this line should be run upon our imperfect data, we cannot escape error. We have on the one side Mr. Bartlett, the commissioner, and on the other Colonel Graham, who differs with him, and who, in consequence of that difference, was dismissed. The attention of the country is called to this question of difference between them, but we cannot determine it. One thing, however, we can do. We can withhold appropriations for the future. It is probably our duty, in this deficiency bill, to appropriate the means to meet arrears due the employees of the Government. The House of Representatives should hold the Administration responsible, and compel an investigation into the conduct of Commissioner Bartlett. I have no hesitation in saying, from information I have, and which may be found on the files of the Department of the Interior, that his acts will not bear scrutiny, and that, as soon as such examination takes place, he will be withdrawn from that important public trust. The attention of the country has slumbered long enough, and I am determined that the Administration shall be made responsible. The House of Representatives is called upon to see that right and justice is done in this matter; but we cannot undertake to decide it without the necessary data before us. I am not in favor of this kind of legislation. I care nothing about this proviso. It is a matter of no import whatever. If a great public wrong is about to be perpetrated under the sanction of the Administration—if an attempt is being made to establish a line which is a fraud upon the treaty, let us at once take the bull by the horns, and remedy the evil, as becomes statesmen and Representatives of the people, instead of attempting to reach it in this negative manner.

We have no power to investigate this matter, but we have the power to send forth a voice from this Hall, calling for an investigation of the conduct of this commissioner, who stands charged with having committed a blunder, if nothing worse, in the establishment of this boundary. I repeat, I am opposed to this amendment. Let us meet this matter boldly, and do what we can in order to remedy the evil. Let us say to the President, that in making this appropriation to meet deficiencies due to innocent employees, we are keeping the faith of the Government. But when we come to act upon the civil and diplomatic bill, we will withhold all future supplies for this boundary commission until the country is fully informed in relation to the doings of the past. We cannot now satisfy ourselves in relation to the true starting-point upon the Rio Grande. I am satisfied that the one agreed upon by the present commissioner ought not for a moment to be sanctioned.

Mr. CARTER demanded tellers on Mr. BROOKS's amendment.

Tellers were ordered, and Messrs. STANTON, of Tennessee, and HENDRICKS were appointed.

The question was then put, and the tellers reported—ayes 70, noes 64.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SACKETT. I move to strike out the whole proviso, and I will state the reason why I make the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that amendment is hardly in order. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment of the Senate as amended.

Mr. SACKETT. I move to strike out all after the word "provided," for the purpose of making a statement which I think the House ought to have.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests that the amendment is out of order. The question now before the committee is upon the adoption of the amendment of the Senate, as amended by the committee.

Mr. SACKETT. The committee has not yet adopted the proviso as amended. It is still subject to amendment. Have I not the right to address the committee in opposition to the adoption of that?

[Cries of "No!" "No!" "No!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can address the committee in support of it. [Laughter.]

The question was then taken upon the adoption of the fifth amendment of the Senate as amended by the committee, and there were, on a division, 69 in the affirmative, noes not counted.

So the amendment as amended was adopted.

The next and sixth amendment of the Senate was then read, considered, and adopted; namely, to strike out the word "fifteen," and insert the word "twelve," in the following clause, viz:

"For subdividing fifty townships in California in sections, at a rate not exceeding fifteen dollars per mile, $35,000."

The next and seventh amendment of the Senate was then read, as follows:

"Insert after line one hundred and eight,

"For compensation of the Surveyor General of Arkansas, per act of August 8, 1846, $2,000.

"For clerks in the office of the Surveyor General of Arkansas, per act of August 8, 1846, $5,300."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on concurring in the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. HOUSTON. That amendment was non-concurring in by the Committee on Ways and Means, and the question, I believe, is on concurring with the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not advised of any report from the committee, and therefore stated the question to be upon concurring in the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. HOUSTON. The way is to put the question so as not to lose sight of the various stages of the proceedings, and that is upon concurring with the report of the Committee on Ways and Means, which is a committee of this House, because otherwise the House might vote without knowing anything the Committee on Ways and Means have done. The universal practice is, that whenever amendments from the Senate are sent here, they are referred to a committee of this body, and that committee concurs or non-concurs. Then, when they come back to the Committee of the Whole from the committee to which they were referred, we either concur or non-concur with the committee, and then when the amendments come into the House, the House concurs or non-concurs with the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. A committee of this House take the matter into consideration, and recommend to the House to concur or non-concur, and the question always is as to concurrence with the Senate.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the question to be propounded now to the committee upon concurring in the amendment of the Senate.

The question was then taken on the amendment proposed by the Senate, and it was not agreed to.

The next being the eighth amendment proposed by the Senate, was to strike out the word "five," and insert "six" in the following clause, viz:

"For surveys in the mineral region of Michigan, at a rate not exceeding five dollars per mile, $20,650."

Mr. HOUSTON. The Committee on Ways and Means reject this amendment.

Mr. CONGER. The only question involved here is, whether the maximum price to be allowed for surveys of mineral lands in Michigan shall be five or six dollars. As the bill originally passed the House, it was five dollars. It was amended in the Senate by striking out five and inserting six. I believe the Committee on Ways and Means did not recommend a concurrence in the amendment of the Senate. It appears from a communication to the Department here, from the surveyor general of Michigan, that a less price than six dollars per mile will not be sufficient to compensate any surveyor of competent ability for this work. I will send to the Clerk a communication from the surveyor general of Michigan, upon this subject.

The communication was then read as follows:

SURVEYOR GENERAL'S OFFICE, }
DETROIT, March 21, 1853.

I have learned, within a day or two, that the Committee on Ways and Means have recently reported to the House of Representatives a bill containing an appropriation for surveys in the mineral regions of this State. I regret to learn also, that the committee have reduced the price estimated for that service from six to five dollars per mile.

It is doubtless known to the Department that six dollars per mile, the maximum price heretofore allowed for surveying in the mineral regions, is no more than a reasonable allowance for that service, and it is believed, therefore, that the committee referred to have not received the sanction of your office, in the action which has been taken in reference to this appropriation.

The amount asked for in my estimate for the completion of the surveys in the mineral regions, is no more than will be required to accomplish the object designed, and it will be impossible to go on with that work at a maximum price of five dollars per mile. Some of the townships may perhaps be surveyed at a less price than six dollars. But in the largest portion of that country no competent deputy could be induced to undertake the survey at a lower price than that found in my estimate, which was made with care and with particular reference to the townships to be surveyed.

I have therefore respectfully to request that you will inform the committee, or other proper persons, of the absolute necessity of making the appropriation correspond with the estimates from this office, otherwise the surveys in the mineral regions will have to be suspended.

Most obediently, &c.,

CHARLES NOBLE.

Mr. CONGER. I have also here a communication from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, agreeing in the views taken by the surveyor general of Michigan in that letter.

It is very well known to every one here that that section of country is somewhat different from other sections of the country that are to be surveyed. The peculiar geological character of the country is such that it requires more time to survey lands there than it does in other sections of the country where there are no mineral deposits.

The simple question is, shall we give six dollars as the maximum price, and have the lands surveyed, or give a less sum and stop those surveys. That is the question, and I submit it to the committee.

Mr. HOUSTON. The Committee on Ways and Means were not satisfied from the evidence before them that the estimate of the Land Office Department was confined alone to mineral lands. An aware, that where there are large mineral deposits, they are in the habit of giving a greater compensation per mile for the service than where such deposits are not to be found. But it seems that there is a very large section of country in Michigan where it is almost all mineral land. There is no reason in the world why the compensation should be six dollars per mile, unless it is because of the mineral deposits.

The committee did not believe, from the evidence before them, that that section of country, although there may be some mineral deposits in the region now proposed to be surveyed, was of that character as to require this increased compensation.

Mr. CONGER. I believe there are no other lands referred to than mineral lands.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is very easy to call them mineral lands.

The question was then taken on concurring with the amendment proposed by the Senate, above inserted, and it was agreed to.

The next amendment proposed by the Senate, being the ninth, to strike out the words "$20,650," and insert "$21,780" in the same clause last above inserted, was then read, considered, and agreed to.

The tenth amendment of the Senate, comprising the clauses following, was read, considered, and agreed to, viz:

"For completing the improvements of New Jersey avenue, north of the Capitol, $9,000.
"For planting and finishing the roads and walks through that portion of the public mall surrounding the Smithsonian Institution, $7,000.

"For payment to August Humbert of balance of his salary as United States assayer of gold in California, under the act of 31st September, 1850, $1,351."

The eleventh amendment of the Senate was read, proposing to strike out "$1,000," and insert "$1,200," in the proviso of the following clause:

"For compensation of extra clerks employed in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions, $33,000: Provided, That no clerk shall receive more than at the rate of $1,000 per annum under this act."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. This is in the same condition as the amendment proposed at the commencement in regard to clerks in the Third Auditor's office. It was intended, by inserting $1,200 there, to give the Secretary discretionary power to designate who should receive $1,200 per annum. The remainder were to receive not above $1,000 per annum. If the amendment, as it is here proposed, should be agreed to, the salary of $1,200 per annum will be applicable to all clerks employed under this appropriation. The chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate assured me that was not the intention of that committee, and consequently it will be necessary to make an amendment to have it conform to the intention of the proposers of the amendment in the Senate. In lieu of the amendment of the Senate, I move to insert these words:

No clerk shall receive more than at the rate of $1,000 per annum under this act, except two, whose annual salary shall not exceed $1,200.

That will make it conform to the one the committee disposed of in regard to the Third Auditor's office.

Mr. EVANS. The gentleman seems to understand that the power will be given to the Commissioner to employ more than twenty clerks. I want to know what difference it makes, whether he employs twenty at $1,000 per annum, or sixteen at $1,200 per annum? If sixteen clerks at $1,200 per annum will do more work than twenty at $1,000, let the Secretary employ them.

Mr. JONES. That is not the object of the amendment. It is that the Secretary might give $1,200 annual salary to two of the clerks, and $1,000 per annum to the balance.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is for services already rendered. The clerks have been employed and discharged the duty.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The twelfth amendment of the Senate was then read as follows:

"Page 7, after line 143, insert:
"For expenses of establishing the superintendency of Indian Affairs in California, authorized by the act of 3d of March, 1853, viz:
"For salary of superintendent, $1,318 00.

"For salary of clerk, $824 17.
"For rent of office for superintendent, $1,030.
"For stationery, fuel, lights, &c., for office of superintendent, $275.
"For messenger, expenses, &c., $403.
"For labor, miscellaneous items, and contingent expenses of the superintendency, $275.
"For presents and provisions for Indians visiting superintendent on official business, $1,000.
"For traveling expenses of the superintendent and the necessary attendants, $2,500.
"For furniture for superintendent's office, $300.
"For iron safe for superintendent's office, $1,000.
"For United States flags for distribution among the tribes, $5.00."

Mr. HOUSTON. The Committee on Ways and Means have agreed to the first branch of this amendment, which gives to the superintendent of Indian Affairs in California his salary from the time of his appointment to the end of the last fiscal year. The law establishing this superintendency was passed in March last, after the regular estimates were before Congress. The superintendent of Indian Affairs was appointed the day after the law was passed. The Committee on Ways and Means supposed they were probably bound to pay the superintendent's salary from that time to the end of the year. They have rejected the remainder of the Senate's amendment, for the reason that those appropriations would not be needed during the last fiscal year, and had no business in this bill. For instance, on inquiry made by the Committee on Ways and Means, we learn that his clerk has not even been appointed. The superintendent of Indian Affairs is now in the city, and there is, therefore, no necessity for office rent for the last year. That is the class of items all through their list. I move to strike out all after the first branch of the amendment, which provides for the payment of the salary of the superintendent.

Mr. McCORKLE. The statement made by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means is very true, but I am opposed to striking out the clauses he proposes, for one or two reasons, which I think will satisfy the committee. The amendment offered by the Committee on Ways and Means, should not now receive its assent. It is true that the superintendent of Indian Affairs is now in this city, and he has never been out of it, for the simple reason that he has never had money to carry him out of it. He has not rented an office during the last year, because he was not in the country where his duties were to be performed, and he had no need of an office. But it is of lasting importance to the people of California at this time, that this superintendent should be dispatched immediately to the scene of action. There is a war of extermination going on between the whites and Indians in California. The last news received from there contained an account of the slaughter of one hundred and thirty-five Indians in one battle between the miners and the Indians; and by a message delivered to the last Legislature by the Governor of that State, we learn that in three counties, within the space of four months, over one hundred whites had been murdered, and that over $200,000 worth of property had been stolen or destroyed by the Indians. It is well understood in that State, and here in political circles, at least, that the treaties made by the Indian commissioners in California will not be, as they ought not to be, ratified by the Senate. When this news reaches California, which it will in all probability, by the next steamer which departs from New York, there will be an absolute necessity for some man to be on the ground who has power to make treaties with Indians, and settle the difficulties which must inevitably arise when they hear of the rejection of the treaties.

Mr. HUNTER. I call the gentleman to order. The part proposed to be stricken out has nothing to do with the superintendent of Indian Affairs in California.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman's remarks are in order.

Mr. McCORKLE. If the amendment of the Committee on Ways and Means be carried, it will, of course, delay the departure of the superintendent of Indian Affairs to California until after the general appropriation bill shall have been passed; and he cannot arrive in that State before the 1st of December or January next. It is of great importance that he should be on the ground immediately, for the reasons which I have stated;

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

PUBLISHED AT WASHINGTON, BY JOHN C. RIVES.—TERMS $3 FOR THIS SESSION.

32D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, JULY 9, 1852.

NEW SERIES.....No. 106.

and the salary of $1,300 proposed to be paid him by the remnant of the provision in the deficiency bill, proposed by the Committee on Ways and Means to be retained, will barely be sufficient to carry him to California. He will not be able to leave the city of San Francisco, and he will not be enabled to enter on the discharge of any of his duties.

Mr. SACKETT. I wish to ask whether the part proposed to be stricken out has anything to do with the salary of the Indian agent in California?

Mr. McCORKLE. No, sir. It provides, however, for his traveling expenses, for his office rent, equally as necessary as his salary, and more so.

Mr. SACKETT. That all comes within the present fiscal year.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will state, Mr. Chairman, that the Committee on Ways and Means called on the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, by letter, to furnish them with estimates for this object, to go into the regular bill making appropriations for the Indian Department, Indian treaties, &c., which they intend to ask the House to put in when that bill is taken up, which I hope will be in two or three days.

Mr. McCORKLE. So I understand; but I object to that for the reason that it makes a delay which will be extremely disastrous to the people of California. It will occasion a delay of six months, at least.

Mr. HOUSTON. Oh, no!

Mr. McCORKLE. That will not pass till very near the adjournment of the House.

Mr. HOUSTON. It will pass in a few days.

Mr. McCORKLE. It is on account of this delay we object to striking this matter out. I trust the committee will not agree in the amendment.

Mr. FITCH. I suppose, Mr. Chairman, I cannot offer an amendment, as this is an amendment to an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment is not now in order.

Mr. FITCH. I think I can call for a division of the amendment, and under that call am at liberty to state my reasons.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that would not be in order.

Mr. FITCH. There are three items of the amendment which could be stricken out with great propriety; but the remainder should be retained, or the delay which the gentleman from California stated must inevitably occur to the operations of this superintendent. When he arrives there he will be incapable of doing any good unless this money be appropriated.

The question was then put on Mr. Houston's amendment, to strike out all of the Senate's amendment save the first branch in relation to the salary of the superintendent, and on a division there were—ayes 65—

Mr. ROBBINS demanded tellers; which were ordered, and Mr. MARSHALL, of California, and Mr. CHANDLER were appointed.

The question was again put, and the amendment to the amendment was agreed to, the tellers having reported—ayes 78, noes not counted.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would ask the committee to concur in the amendment as amended. That is now the question.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. VENABLE. I move that the committee rise.

The question was then taken, and it was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 207, being the deficiency bill, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

INVALID PENSION BILL.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would like the House to agree to a very immaterial amendment of the Senate to one of the naval appropriation bills—the invalid pension bill.

Mr. STANLY. Order! Order!

Mr. HOUSTON. It is a mere formal amendment. It is to correct a reference to a law under which the appropriation is made. It involves no principle. They want the money at the Pension Office, as I understand.

Mr. CABELL, of Florida, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as correctly enrolled the following bills; which received the signature of the Speaker, viz:

An act to enable the Legislature of the State of Indiana to dispose of the unsold lands in said State;

An act in relation to a certain lot of land in the town of Gnadenhutten, in the State of Ohio;

An act to supply a deficiency to the State of Indiana, in a township of land granted to said State for the use of a State University, by act of Congress, approved the 19th of April, 1816; and

An act to release from reservation and restore to the mass of public lands certain lands in the State of Arkansas.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask the concurrence of the House to the amendment of the Senate, of which I have already spoken.

Mr. FITCH. I hope that motion will not be insisted upon in this thin House.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is a mere correction of a reference to a law under which we permit invalid pensions.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. FOWLER, the House then adjourned.

PETITIONS, &c.

The following petitions, memorials, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, July 8, 1852.

Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

Mr. ATCHISON called the Senate to order, and caused a letter to be read which he had received from the President pro tempore, requesting him to preside this day, in the absence of the President.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. FELCH presented the memorial of Allen T. Welch, praying a pension on account of disability incurred while in the military service of the United States during the late war with Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CHASE presented a petition of citizens of Ohio, praying that the unsold lands in Ohio, purchased of the tribe of Wyandot Indians, may be offered for sale at Upper Sandusky, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BRODHEAD presented the memorial of C. B. McKnight and others, praying a modification of the late bounty land law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MALLORY presented the petition of George P. Welsh and Clark H. Wells, passed midshipmen in the Navy, praying to be allowed additional compensation during the time they performed the duties of a higher grade; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

THE HOMESTEAD BILL.

Mr. CHASE. I have been requested to present to the Senate a petition of citizens of Morgan county, Ohio, asking for the passage of the homestead bill. These petitioners express great anxiety lest the delay of that measure may defeat it; and they earnestly urge that it may be taken up and acted upon at this session. As I am aware that this anxiety is not peculiar to these petitioners, but is participated in by a very large number of the citizens of the State which I have the honor in part to represent, I beg leave to ask of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, [Mr. FELCH,] whether a report upon that bill may be expected soon? I am myself aware, to some extent, of the causes which have delayed a report; but in order that the public may understand what is the prospect of speedy action upon the bill, I ask the chairman of the committee to respond to my inquiry.

Mr. FELCH. In answer to the inquiry of the Senator from Ohio, I will state, that the bill to which he refers, immediately after it was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, was sent to the Land Office for information on the subject. We saw at once that important changes in the whole land system, if not an overturning of that system, would follow the proposed legislation, and it was thought necessary to obtain information in regard to its practical working before we went on. An answer was returned from the Department towards the end of the week before last, but an interruption has occurred in the business of the committee, in consequence of the death of one of our members. Previous to that event, we took up the subject and gave it some consideration, but further action has been delayed by the absence of a member [Mr. UNDERWOOD] on a duty with which the Senate is fully acquainted. We are obliged to await the return of that Senator, as he intends to propose some amendments to the bill. I can only say, that we are anxious to act on the bill, and have lost no time in considering it, and immediately after the return of the Senator from Kentucky, will be prepared to report a bill. I trust that we may be enabled to do so next week.

Mr. CHASE. I was aware myself that the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, as well as other members of the committee, were not chargeable with any unreasonable delay in the discharge of the duties devolving upon them. I was, however, very desirous to have some assurance on the part of the chairman that this bill would be reported upon at an early day. There is no measure at present before Congress in which the people of my State take a deeper interest than they do in relation to this bill—an interest which I profoundly share.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. FELCH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill from the House of Representatives, to amend an act entitled "An act for the discontinuance of the office of surveyor general in the several districts so soon as the surveys therein can be completed, for abolishing land offices under certain circumstances, 'and for other purposes," reported it back with amendment.

Mr. HUNTER, from the Committee on Finance, to which were referred the memorials of Pais, Mir & Co., George Foster & Co., C. B. Broadwell & Co., A. F. Cochran & Co., Cotchett & Chapman, and Charles Belcher & Co., praying that duties paid by them upon American casks and barrels, may be refunded, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DOUGLAS, from the Committee on the Territories, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment:

An act to run and establish the boundary between the State of Texas and the Territories of the United States;

An act making further appropriations for the construction of roads in the Territory of Minnesota; and

An act to amend an act entitled "An act to settle and adjust the expenses of the people of Oregon in defending themselves from attacks and hostilities of Cayuse Indians, in the years 1847 and 1848," approved February 14, 1850.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill for the benefit of the town of Bellevue, reported it back with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, reported a bill to create three additional land districts in the State of Iowa; which was read and passed to the second reading.

SHIP CANAL AROUND THE FALLS OF SAULT STE. MARIE.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Committee on Commerce, to which was referred a memorial of citizens of Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, praying for the construction of a ship canal around the Falls of Sault Ste. Marie, have desired me to ask that they may be discharged from its further consideration. The Committee on Commerce had this subject under their charge at an early day of the session, and made a report, not adversely, but setting forth its commercial and military character. They then, as now, desired to be discharged from the consideration of the subject, because the Committee on Public Lands had it before them; and it has been deemed advisable, that if this object is prosecuted, it should be done by the instrumentality of the public lands. I make this statement because there has been a report in circulation that the Committee on Commerce had reported adversely in regard to this project, which is not the case.

The motion to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the memorial was agreed to.

NEW LAND DISTRICT IN IOWA.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands, to report a bill to create three additional land districts in the State of Iowa, and I throw myself upon the indulgence of the Senate to ask that they will consent to take up the bill, and consider it at this time. The State of Iowa, although one of the largest States in the Union, has but three land districts within its borders. It has now a larger amount of public land yet to be disposed of than any other State. Our people are compelled to travel from two hundred to two hundred and fifty miles to enter their lands at the land offices. The recent acquisition of territory upon the northern portion of that State, renders it indispensable that these offices should be created. I trust the Senate will consent to act upon the bill at this time.

The bill was read a first time.

Mr. DODGE. I hope this bill will be read a second time, and put upon its passage. If it is passed, the State of Iowa will then have six land offices, and in that respect will place us upon an equality with the State of Indiana. Illinois has ten land offices; your own State (Missouri) has eight; Alabama has eight; Mississippi has five, and Arkansas seven.

The bill was read a second time, and was considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. It was reported to the Senate without amendment, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read a third time and passed.

THE PUBLIC DEBT.

Mr. HUNTER gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill for the redemption of the public debt.

VIRGINIA BOUNTY LAND WARRANTS.

Mr. HUNTER. I move to postpone all prior orders, for the purpose of taking up the bill appropriating land scrip in full and final satisfaction of Virginia military bounty land warrants. I believe it will take but little time to act upon it. An amendment has been unanimously reported by the Committee on Public Lands, to which I agree, and I hope the Senate will indulge me on this occasion, and allow the bill to be taken up.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded as in Committee of the Whole to consider the bill. The Committee on Public Lands reported an amendment to it in the form of a substitute for the entire bill. It enacts that all unsatisfied, outstanding military land warrants, or parts of warrants, issued prior to March 1, 1852, by the proper authorities of the Commonwealth of Virginia, for military services performed by the officers and soldiers of the Virginia State and Continental line of the Army of the Revolution, may be surrendered to the Secretary of the Interior, who, upon being satisfied by a revision of the proofs, or by additional testimony, that any warrant thus surrendered was fairly and justly issued in pursuance of the laws of said Commonwealth for military services so rendered, shall issue land scrip in favor of the present proprietor of the warrant so surrendered for the whole or any portion thereof unsatisfied, at the rate of $1 25 per acre for that which remains unsatisfied; which scrip shall be receivable in payment for any lands owned by the United States subject to sale at private entry, and shall also be assignable by indorsement attested by two witnesses. In issuing such scrip the Secretary is authorized, when more persons than one are interested in the same warrant, to issue to each person scrip for his or her portion; and when infants or femmes covert may be entitled, the guardian of the infant and husband of the femme may receive and sell or locate the same, provided that no less than a legal subdivision shall be entered and paid for in virtue of scrip issued under this act. It enacts further, that the act shall be taken as a full and final adjustment of all bounty land claims of officers and soldiers of the State of Virginia for services in the war of the Revolution.

Mr. CHASE. I offer the following amendment to the amendment of the committee, to come in at the end of the second section:

Provided, That the State of Virginia shall, by a proper act of the Legislature thereof, relinquish all claim to the lands in the Virginia military bounty land district in the State of Ohio, which lands are hereby ceded to the said State of Ohio, saving all claims of individuals or corporations in or to the same.

A word may be necessary in explanation of that amendment. The object of the bill is to satisfy claims of the soldiers of the State of Virginia for military bounty land warrants, by giving them scrip; consequently there will be no longer any reason why Virginia should retain any claim upon that portion of the public lands in Ohio, reserved to satisfy them. Those lands are very inferior in quality, and very limited in quantity, and that is one reason—indeed the sole reason—why they have not been heretofore taken up. As it is now proposed that these warrants shall be satisfied in scrip, there can be no objection to following out the policy of the bill, which passed the Senate the other day, ceding to the State the residue of these lands. The quantity does not exceed fifty or sixty thousand acres. They are all embraced in two or three counties, and their present condition, not being valuable enough to be taken up, only operates to prevent their settlement.

Mr. HUNTER. I have but one objection to the amendment. It is all very proper in itself, and I have no doubt that if no such amendment were adopted, the Legislature of Virginia would make any relinquishment which might be necessary. The only objection which I have to it is, that it will delay the action of the Secretary of the Interior upon these warrants until the action of the Legislature of Virginia is had. It strikes me that it will hardly be necessary, in any point of view; but if put into the bill, it will surely delay the action of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CHASE. I think, upon a moment's reflection, the Senator will be satisfied that my amendment cannot delay the action of the Secretary of the Interior. I propose to add the proviso to the second section of the bill, and being there it will not delay in the smallest degree the action of that officer. If it were in the other section, it might do so.

Mr. HUNTER. I am anxious to get the bill on any terms, and if the Senator insists I shall interpose no further objection.

Mr. FELCH. I did not understand very fully the explanation made by the Senator from Ohio upon the subject. It seems to me, however, that the amendment is entirely unnecessary, so far as releasing any claim of Virginia upon the lands referred to is concerned. If I understand correctly the terms of the grant, this land was reserved in the original grant from Virginia land between the rivers Scioto and Little Miami, but it was reserved as a trust fund, for the purpose of enabling the soldiers of the Virginia State and Continental line to obtain their bounties, and it was then presumed, evidently, that it would be sufficient to answer that purpose. But I suppose the moment the claims for the bounty lands are satisfied, Virginia can have no claim upon the lands remaining. There has been an application to the Senate during the present session, for some legislation upon the subject, which might enable the parties holding the scrip to locate on the remnant of the grant. There are several parties, as it appears from the application, who are anxious still to locate on the small remnant of the old reservation. Some of the lands which formerly were considered of little value, are now considered so valuable, that persons holding scrip desire to locate upon them. I should be unwilling to legislate here in such a manner as to prevent the locating on the remaining portions of the land. If that is the object of the amendment to the amendment, I think we ought not to adopt it. It seems to me also, as I before remarked, that it cannot be necessary in order to restore to the United States the perfect title to any portion of the land, whenever the Virginia military bounty land warrants shall be satisfied. A question is raised here upon the other part of the proposition, which is ceding the lands to the State. A bill has already passed the Senate, ceding all the remaining lands in Ohio to that State. That, I believe, has been laid on the table in the House of Representatives. And I would suggest to the Senator, whether it would not tend to defeat this bill to ingraft the same provision upon it.

Mr. CHASE. I think if my friend from Michigan will look at the circumstances of the case, he will be satisfied that my amendment is proper, and in its proper place. These lands were reserved in the original cession of Virginia to the United States of the lands embraced in the Northwestern Territory for the satisfaction of her military bounty land warrants. It was supposed, undoubtedly, at the time of the reservation, not merely that these lands would be sufficient, but that the lands southeast of the river Ohio would suffice without resorting to these lands at all. But the large number of warrants, and their magnitude, created a very different state of things, and resulted in the taking of every available acre of land in the reservation. There now remain nothing but unavailable lands, with the exception, perhaps, of a few tracts which have been long occupied by actual settlers, but which are claimed by some, under corrected surveys, to be still open to entry. Ceding the lands to the State will merely complete the act which the Senate passed the other day, providing for the cession of all unsold land, reserving these from its operation on account of the right of Virginia to have her military warrants satisfied from them. We now make another provision for the benefit of Virginia which relieves these lands entirely. Then the policy of that act applies to these lands, and with augmented force, because a portion of them are in actual occupancy of the people of the State, which has been long continued, and the residue are not of any value at all. They are of so little value, as I said before, that nobody would enter a warrant upon them.

Mr. HUNTER. I will suggest to the Senator from Ohio, that all he desires from Virginia, is to cede her right to the lands.

Mr. CHASE. That is all.

Mr. HUNTER. This amendment goes further, and proposes to incorporate into the bill, a cession of them to the State of Ohio. If the Senator will confine his amendment to the first object, I will agree to it; that is to say, if he will so amend his amendment that it shall read: "Pro'vided, That the State of Virginia shall, by a 'proper act of the Legislature thereof, relinquish 'all claim to the lands of the Virginia military 'land district in the State of Ohio,' reserving the question of the cession to the State of Ohio, I will agree to it. I am afraid that his amendment, as it now stands, will endanger the bill in the House of Representatives, and I am sure he does not desire that.

Mr. CHASE. Certainly not.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope he will modify his amendment by striking out all that occurs after what I have read, which will provide for the relinquishment by the State of Virginia of her right and title to those lands.

Mr. CHASE. I would very much desire to accommodate the Senator, but there is no earthly reason that I can see, why there should be any objection to the cession to the State of Ohio. If my proposing it would endanger the bill of the Senator here or elsewhere, I should be very unwilling to ingraft it upon it; but the utmost effect would be, that, if the House were not prepared to agree to the amendment, they would strike it out. I prefer to take a vote upon my amendment as it stands.

Mr. HUNTER. I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, by striking out all after the word "Ohio," where it first occurs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion, that the motion is not in order. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, is an amendment to an amendment, and therefore, in the opinion of the Chair, it cannot, at this stage of the bill, be amended; so that the question will be upon the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FELCH. I hope the Senator will consent to withdraw his amendment. I will state another reason, in addition to what I have already stated. There is probably no portion of the country where the land titles acquired by these bounties are so complicated, and give rise to so many difficult questions, as in this same tract of country reserved for the purpose of these bounty land warrants.

The passage of the other act to which I have alluded, refers directly to the litigation which has grown up in regard to these. The whole tract of land was set aside to satisfy the warrants; and every man located as he pleased, gave such shape to his premises as he pleased, and made his own surveys and lines. The consequence is, that the shapes are very irregular; and frequently conflicting claims overlap each other, and sometimes do not meet at all, so as to leave gaps between them.

Mr. CHASE. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him—I am exceedingly averse to delaying the action of the Senate on the bill, and I will therefore modify my amendment in conformity with the suggestion of the Senator from Virginia, to strike out all after the word "Ohio," where it first occurs.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment as modified, and it was agreed to; and the amendment of the committee as amended was agreed to. The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; the amendment was concurred in; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

THIRD READING OF A BILL.

The engrossed bill to establish the subdivisional lines and corners of certain fractional sections in the southern surveying district of Alabama was read a third time and passed.

POST ROUTES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The House of Representatives has returned, with an amendment, the joint resolution of the Senate to establish certain post routes.

Mr. RUSK. This is not the general post route bill. It is simply a joint resolution, providing that plank roads shall be post roads. The amendment of the House is simply to make a particular plank road, which was not named in the resolution originally, a post road. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

RAILROADS IN ARKANSAS.

Mr. BORLAND. I ask the favor of the Senate, as the time for taking up the bill which is the order of the day has not quite arrived, to take up the bill granting to the State of Arkansas the right of way and a portion of the public lands, to aid in the construction of a railroad from Gaines's Landing to Fulton, in said State. It is a bill which will not give rise to any discussion, as it is precisely like similar bills which have heretofore passed the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill as in Committee of the Whole. A verbal amendment having been made, it was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

FRANCIS TRIBOU.

On the motion of Mr. HAMLIN, the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill of the House entitled "An act for the relief of Francis Tribou." It provides for placing the name of Francis Tribou, of Monroe, in the county of Waldo, in the State of Maine, on the roll of invalid pensioners, at the rate of four dollars per month—the pension to commence on January 1st, 1848, and to continue during his natural life.

Mr. HAMLIN. This bill has passed the House of Representatives. It has received the sanction of the Committee on Pensions in this body. I apprehend there will be no objection to it; but I will not occupy the time of the Senate by discussing it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

JOHN DUFF.

On the motion of Mr. BRODHEAD, the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill for the relief of John Duff. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Navy to cause to be discontinued the suit brought against John Gonder, Jr., and John Duff, in the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, for an alleged violation of the contract made by him on the 20th of June, 1846, to furnish stone for the dry-dock at the Brooklyn navy-yard.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN IOWA.

On the motion of Mr. JONES, of Iowa, the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to regulate the terms of the district court of the United States for the district of Iowa. It provides that, instead of three terms annually of the district court of the United States for the district of Iowa, as now prescribed by law, there shall hereafter be held annually six terms of said court, as follows: At Dubuque, on the first Mondays of January and July; at Iowa City, on the first Mondays of May and October; and at Burlington on the third Mondays in May and October. It proceeds to make other provisions, rendered necessary by these changes in the terms of the court.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

HEIRS OF ROBERT SEWALL.

On the motion of Mr. PRATT, the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of the heirs and representatives of the late Robert Sewall.

It proposes to direct the Third Auditor of the Treasury to audit the claim of the heirs and representatives of the late Robert Sewall, and determine the amount that may be due to them; that he report the said amount to the Secretary of the Treasury, who is required to cause the same to be paid.

Mr. PRATT. I move to amend the bill by inserting after the words "Robert Sewall," the words "for a house, destroyed in 1814 by the enemy."

The amendment was agreed to; the bill was reported to the Senate as amended; the amendment was concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

ICHABOD WEYMOUTH.

On the motion of Mr. HAMLIN, the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the House bill entitled "An act for the relief of Ichabod Weymouth."

It provides that the Secretary of the Interior place the name of Ichabod Weymouth upon the roll of invalid pensioners, at the rate of eight dollars per month—to commence January 1, 1850, and to continue during his natural life.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

PROTECTION OF EMIGRANTS TO OREGON.

AND CALIFORNIA.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on the Territories, "for the 'protection of the emigrant route, and a telegraphic 'line, and for an overland mail between the Mis- 'souri river and the settlements in California and 'Oregon.'" This bill was reported from the Committee on the Territories some time since, and it is very necessary that the protection should be furnished. I hope the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. RUSK. This is a most important bill. It should involve a great deal of consideration and reflection, and will consume more time than we can possibly be able to give to it to-day. There is a bill in relation to the protection of life in steamboats, which was nearly completed yesterday, which was ordered to be printed as amended. The printing has not yet been quite done, but I understand that the bill will be here in a few minutes. Therefore I think it will be impossible for us to make much progress to-day with the bill mentioned by the Senator from Illinois. It is a bill of very great importance, and one which will evidently require a good deal of time, and which will, perhaps, draw out a great deal of discussion.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If the Senate will fix a specific time—say Tuesday next—for the consideration of the bill, with the understanding that we shall then take it up and go on with it, I shall have no objection to waiving it now. This, it is true, is a very important bill, but it is very important that it should be acted on. The business of the Territories has been giving way to every other description of business, until it is thrown into this late part of the session. If it is the desire of the Senate to postpone the bill till Tuesday morning at one o'clock, and make it the special order for that time, I will yield.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the Senator will not press anything that will come in the way of the bill which is the unfinished business of yesterday, providing for the better security of the lives of passengers on board steamers. I expect the printed bill every moment to be laid on the tables of Senators, and I wish to proceed with it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Then I move that the bill I have indicated be made the special order for Tuesday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has not yet been taken up.

Mr. RUSK. I am afraid that if we make this bill a special order, it will draw out a great deal of discussion. There are a great many bills which Senators are anxious to get up. I have no objection to taking up this bill as soon as we can; but I would not have it made a special order. I know there are other very important bills which ought to be acted on; but if we make this bill a special order, it will stand in the way of other bills, and will have to be postponed before other bills can be taken up. It is too late in the session, in my opinion, to make the bill a special order; and I apprehend the Senator from Illinois will progress more rapidly if he shall not press such a proposition, for I think there is a general disposition to take up the bill and give it a fair discussion. It is connected with one or two other bills which have been presented, involving the same subject. So far as I am concerned, I shall be willing to take it up and discuss it as soon as possible; but I should regret very much to see it or any other bill made the special order, to exclude, in all probability, the consideration of some other important bills.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It cannot exclude them unless this bill is to be resisted, and leads to discussion; and, if so, we ought to have a hearing on it. I have been beseeching the Senate for more than four months to take up a few territorial bills. I first made the attempt before the territorial day in the House elapsed, in April; but I could not get a hearing on any of these bills. Every other description of bill could be taken up; but I could not get the Senate to tolerate the idea of considering a territorial bill. I have now pending ten or fifteen territorial bills which ought to be disposed of. All other descriptions of bills—private bills and public bills—have been taken up, by unanimous consent and by courtesy; but the moment a territorial bill is indicated, objection is made, not only to considering it on that day, but on any future day. It seems as if there was a design, that this bill should never be considered—should never be entertained. If the Senate will indicate any time more agreeable to them than that which I have named, I will conform to their wish. But really, crowding it to the last days of the session, and then objecting to its consideration because it is too late, is not the kind of treatment which I think this bill is entitled to receive. I hope the Senate will allow the bill which I have named to be made the special order for Tuesday next.

Mr. RUSK. I dislike to oppose the proposition of the Senator from Illinois; but I see that it will involve the consumption of a great deal of time. This is an important bill in various respects. It proposes a great alteration in regard to our military affairs; it involves a large expenditure of money; it is a proposition entirely new in its character, and involves some very important questions; and it will necessarily connect itself with another question—the construction of a road to the Pacific ocean. If we make it the special order of the day for a particular day, my own impression is, that we shall get into a discussion which will be interminable. I think the better plan will be to take it up at some time, and then dispose of it as soon as we can. I am very willing to vote to take it up at any time when the Senate is in a condition to act upon it. I would be willing to take it up to-day, and consume this day in its investigation, did I not feel so much anxiety in relation to the bill which was under consideration yesterday, and which was then partly completed.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not yet understand the objection of the Senator from Texas. If the bill is made the special order for Tuesday, it will take up no more time on that day than if it were not made the special order.

Mr. RUSK. But if it should not be acted upon on Tuesday it would come up again on Wednesday.

Mr. DOUGLAS. True; but if it should come up without being made the special order, it might run through day after day, if gentlemen should choose to oppose it. The tendency of the argument of the Senator from Texas is, that the bill should never be considered by the Senate, because it will occupy some time. Every bill which is considered occupies some time; and it is not to be supposed that this will be an exception to the general rule. All I desire is, that the bill shall have a fair hearing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would remind the Senator from Illinois, that the question is on proceeding to the consideration of the bill, and not as to any particular disposition of it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I was only replying to the suggestions of the Senator from Texas, who gave reasons why it should not be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois, to postpone the previous orders and proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him.

Mr. DAVIS. I understood the Senator from Illinois to say that he simply wished to assign a future day for its consideration.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Tuesday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill must be taken up before that motion can be put.

The question being taken upon the motion to take up the bill, it was agreed to.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I now move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until Tuesday next, and make it the special order for that day.

Mr. RUSK. If we make it the special order for Tuesday, I think I can see that it will involve the consumption of a great deal of time. This is a bill which involves important principles. It has not been investigated by the Senate. It will require a great deal of time to see the different bearings of the bill. It is one which will involve a very large expenditure of public money. All these things will have to be considered by the Senate. If the bill is made the special order of the day for Tuesday next, it will then come up at one o'clock, and will be discussed during the whole of that day; for I am very certain we shall not be able to get through with it then. As soon as one o'clock arrives on Wednesday no other bill on the Calendar can be taken up without a motion to postpone the special order, which will give rise to discussion. The result will be, in my opinion, not to advance the bill an inch, but to give it a preference which will bring about debate, and consume the time of the Senate at this last stage of the session. I hope, therefore, the Senate will not agree to the proposition to make the bill a special order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has been read a first time, and has been ordered to a second reading; and the Chair would suggest that it would be better to read it a second time before postponing it.

The bill was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the President of the United States to raise, organize, and equip three regiments of volunteers, of ten companies to each regiment, and one hundred men to each company, to serve for a period of three years, in guarding and protecting the emigrant routes and telegraphic lines, and of conveying the mails between the Missouri river and the settlements in California and Oregon. It provides for the establishment of a line of military posts, ten in number, at convenient and suitable points on the route, garrisoned by a force of one hundred men at each; and that there shall be, in addition to the military posts, station-houses at suitable places and distances, not exceeding twenty miles apart, throughout the entire length of the route, to be guarded and protected by at least twenty men on a station. The posts and station-houses are to be of a cheap and temporary character, and yet strong enough for purposes of defense, and of affording the protection contemplated; and they are to be erected by the volunteers, of materials to be obtained in the vicinity of the route. It further proposes to make it the duty of the volunteers, under the direction of the President, to keep the roads on the route in good traveling condition, with sufficient bridges and ferries across the streams to carry the mails, and protect all telegraphic lines, and persons employed in establishing and erecting them, and all emigrants, travelers, settlers, and traders along the line, and its vicinity, from hostilities and depredations by the Indians. The volunteers are to be required to raise, gather, and preserve all the provisions, bread-stuffs, forage, and supplies of whatever kind, which shall be necessary to sustain themselves and their animals, without cost to the Government. A further provision is made, that the colonels of the regiments shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and that all other officers of the regiment, commissioned and non-commissioned, shall be elected by the volunteers; that the volunteers shall be enrolled for three years; that the officers and men composing the regiments shall be entitled to the same pay and emoluments as were allowed to the regiment of mounted riflemen raised in 1846, for the protection of the people of Oregon; and, in addition thereto, shall be entitled, so soon as the military posts and stations are established, to select, each for himself, six hundred and forty acres of land along the route, but not to include tracts upon which the posts and stations shall be located, which are reserved for public uses. It also proposes to grant to Henry O'Reilly the privilege of erecting telegraphic posts through the public domain, from the Western frontier to California and Oregon.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I have only a word to say in reply to the suggestions of the Senator from Texas. Every objection that he makes to the consideration of this bill at the specific time proposed would apply to any other time. Hence, it is an argument against its ever being considered, instead of an argument against its being considered at the particular time proposed. It is an important bill, I admit; but is important only for this reason: that we have no protection provided for the emigrants, travelers, and traders, and the mail-carriers between the western settlements and the Pacific ocean; and murders, robberies, and all sorts of aggressions are committed by the Indians upon our people, while they are passing through the Indian territory. Some protection is due, and is necessary to those people. In 1846, Congress passed a law authorizing military posts to be established, and a regiment to be raised, for the purpose. The creation of that regiment was authorized in general terms, and hence it has been employed in other services, and these posts have not been established.

The only new principle introduced into this bill is, that under it, volunteers are to be raised to go and build these posts of the materials along the line, and are to receive pay as soldiers while engaged in it; but, at the same time, are to be required to raise their own provisions, both for themselves and for their animals—to supply their own animals and their own clothing—thus sustaining themselves; and at the end of three years' service they are to receive six hundred and forty acres of land along the line of the route, so as to form a military colony. Instead of involving a large expenditure, it will reduce your expenses millions of dollars, provided you are going to furnish the protection due to those who may be compelled, in the course of business, to travel over that line.

The question is, Are you going to furnish any protection? If you are, there are but two modes of doing it—one by this military occupation requiring the soldiers to supply themselves; and the other by increasing the force of the regular Army. I undertake to say that, in comparison with the latter plan, the one proposed in this bill will diminish the expenses by millions of dollars yearly. This, therefore, is a plan to reduce and diminish the expenditures of the Government, instead of increasing them. But I do not desire to go into a discussion of the merits of the bill, and I will not do so. I only ask that it be considered.

I presented memorials upon this subject early in the session. The bill was reported several months ago. I have striven, over and over again, to get these territorial bills taken up, but I have been unable to get a hearing upon them; and now it is objected to them that they are going to take too much time. The objection is made particularly with regard to this bill. That objection will increase with the lapse of each day of the session. I wish to know whether the Senate intend to furnish any protection at all to settlers on the frontier, and to emigrants going across the continent. If they do intend to do so, the sooner we act the better. This interferes with no other bill, and I think it will not give rise to much discussion. I have no speech to make upon it. I simply desire, when it shall come up, to explain any provision which any Senator may desire to have explained. I do not believe it will take any considerable time to pass the bill.

Mr. RUSK. Mr. President, I do not mean to enter into a discussion of the merits of the bill, but I think we ought to reflect a great deal before we turn Congress into a sort of commander-in-chief of the Army. There is in this bill a provision, which will certainly give rise to a lengthy discussion, granting special privileges to a particular individual for constructing a telegraphic line to the Pacific ocean.

The difficulty I suggest is this: I see nothing in this bill to give it a preference over all other bills which are before the Senate, and the result of making it the special order for Tuesday next, at this late date of the session, will be to give it a preference over all other bills.

The honorable Senator says that the emigrants on the route to California and Oregon are unprotected. Sir, a large number of my constituents are unprotected. The treaty between the United States and Mexico is violated every day by Indian depredations, and my people are unprotected. All these questions will come up. And, sir, shall we take up this bill proposing a new experiment—one that has not entered into the policy of the Government heretofore—and discuss it to the exclusion of all other matters? When the bill comes up I shall have much to say in regard to it. I have seen soldiers, and I know something of their character. When you turn them into farmers and task them, and make them work, you will have commenced a new kind of exercise in the Army; a new sort of discipline. It will be an entire change of the whole military system of the country. To imagine that a bill of this description will not draw out discussion, is, I think, presuming a great deal. It involves a total change of our whole military system. I am willing to protect these emigrants—I am willing to extend the same protection to one place as to another, but at the same time I wish to see justice done to all.

The honorable Senator does not answer my objection. He says that my objection would apply against taking up this bill on any day. No, sir; not at all. If it is made the special order, it takes itself up every day when one o'clock arrives. What is the result of that? If I have a bill, or if any other Senator has a bill which it is desirable to take up, it requires a motion to postpone the special order, and thereupon a discussion ensues, and the time of the Senate is consumed. I appreciate the motive of the honorable Senator. I concur in the object which he has of protecting the travelers and emigrants. I desire to do it, but I cannot vote for this bill in its present shape. I do not mean, however, to discuss its provisions now. I am willing to vote for anything within the compass of our power which will, in my opinion, accomplish the object in view; but I do not want to give this bill a preference over all the other business of the Senate.

Mr. DOUGLAS. As the Senator resists the fixing of any time for action on this bill, and as he is not ready to take up any bill of his own, I will withdraw the motion to postpone, and submit now a few remarks upon the bill itself. The Senator says he has bills of his own in regard to the protection of Texas, which he desires to have taken up.

Mr. RUSK. No, sir; the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. DOUGLAS. At any rate, the Senator said his own people were unprotected. If they are unprotected, why not bring forward a bill to protect them, instead of urging that as a reason against the protection of other people who are unprotected, and for whose protection bills have been brought forward? Because his own people are not protected against these aggressions, is that any reason to be urged why other people should not be protected? If he does not bring forward bills to protect his own people, is that any reason why the Senator should assail me for performing my duty to my section of country? I have never interfered to prevent him from taking up any bill for the protection of his own State, whenever he desired to do so. If he wishes to give the people of Texas on that frontier, protection by law, or to provide means for that purpose, he will not find me resisting the consideration of any such proposition. I am prepared to help him, to aid him in all the necessary legislation.

But the gentleman from Texas assails the terms of the bill. He says he shall want some change, so far as it specifies one man who may make a telegraphic line across the continent. The proposition is, that Henry O'Reilly, at his own expense, may make a telegraphic line over the public lands. I will agree to modify that proposition, so as to say that Henry O'Reilly, or any other living man, or all men, may make telegraphic lines at their own expense, across the public domain. That will be broad enough, I apprehend, to obviate his objection as to monopoly.

Again, the Senator says he does not object to the object of the bill. He says he appreciates my motive and my desire to protect these people. Then, sir, if we concur in the object, and only differ as to the means, let us take up the bill and consider it; and, if my propositions are not right, let him offer his amendments. Whenever he offers an amendment that commends itself to my judgment, I will at once freely accede to it. I do not pretend that the bill is perfect. I have given it a good deal of reflection. I have made it as perfect as I knew how; but yet it is probable that the gentleman's superior experience in frontier life may enable him to suggest amendments that will improve it. Let him offer them. I shall be ready to receive them in a fair spirit, and agree to them whenever I can. I have no doubt that many Senators can improve the terms of this bill in many respects. That is just what I desire. I wish to have the benefit of their advice, of their suggestions, and their amendments. I care not whether you retain one word, or section, of this bill, provided, when you strike out these provisions, you insert others that will be as effectual for the purpose in view. I do not insist upon the adoption of the bill as it is. All I ask is, that you will afford the requisite and adequate protection to the people on that line, and let us have a fair hearing on this bill for that purpose.

I hope we may proceed to consider the bill now. I think that if we do so, we shall get through with it, perhaps in less time than by discussing it in this irregular way.

Mr. CHASE. This bill contemplates an object of very great importance—a telegraph from Independence, Missouri, I suppose, to San Francisco. The details of the bill will, of course, demand the very careful attention of the Senate. I concur cordially with what has fallen from the Senator from Illinois, with regard to the importance of this work. It is a matter to which I have given some attention, but I think it will be better to postpone the consideration of the bill until a future day when the Senate will be more full, and when Senators, having had their attention called to it, will have an opportunity of looking into the memorial, and the report which has been made. With the concurrence of the Senator from Illinois, therefore, I move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until Tuesday next, and make it the special order for that time; for it is really a matter of very great importance.

Mr. RUSK. I shall ask the yeas and nays upon that motion.

Mr. BRADBURY. I would suggest that it is well known to the Senate, that several members are necessarily absent in the discharge of a duty assigned to them by this body. I would ask whether it be desirable to take up a bill of so much importance during the absence of those who are necessarily away in the discharge of a duty which has been imposed upon them by the Senate?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will only remark, in reply, that when the gentleman from Maine asked us to consider a bill for the relief and protection of one man, a few moments ago, I did not object to it. This is just such a bill, with one exception. This provides for the protection of millions and that for one man.

Mr. BRADBURY. What man?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I allude to the private bill taken up to-day, on the motion of the honorable Senator.

Mr. BRADBURY. I made no motion to-day to take up a private bill, but my colleague did make such a motion.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Then I was laboring under a mistake. I have yielded for several private bills, all involving matters of legitimate legislation for the protection of the rights of persons. This bill provides for the protection of the rights of a large number of persons. There is nothing in the bill which any man cannot easily understand on five minutes' examination. I am willing to consider the bill now, or to postpone it to any given day, if we can have the assurance that it shall have a fair hearing. I shall propose so to amend the bill as to leave in it no exclusive privilege to any person. If there is an objectionable feature in it let it be pointed out, and I will consent to strike it out. If there is an omission, let any gentleman suggest it, and I will vote to put it in. I only ask the consideration of the bill. It is necessary. Justice requires it. The lives of our own citizens require that we should pass it; and I ask that there may be action upon it.

Mr. BRADBURY. The remarks of the Senator from Illinois seem to call for some reply from me. If he had attended to my remarks, he would have perceived that my objection was not to the consideration of the bill, but only to its consideration at the particular time named, when certain distinguished members of the Senate are necessarily absent.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is very true; but there will always be some members absent, and I apprehend that the friends of this bill have more to lose than to gain by the absence of the members alluded to. Several of them I know to be warm advocates of the bill.

Two members absent on the committee to which allusion is made, helped to report this bill from the Committee on the Territories. Another of those gentlemen takes a deep interest in the bill. I do not know that the other half of the committee alluded to are opposed to it at all. Again; they may be back by that time; but I am willing to run the risk of a vote in their absence, because of the manifest justice of the proposition. It is true that if I thought there would be a close vote, I would wish to have them back before the vote was taken. I only desire some time to be fixed for the consideration of the bill. I care not what particular day, so that it is some reasonable time. If the Senate do that I shall be content.

Mr. BORLAND. I hope the proposition to fix an early day for the consideration of this bill will be agreed to. I consider it a bill of more general importance to the Western States than any bill that has been before the Senate this session. To those States especially which lie west of the Mississippi river, or along its course on either side, it is of the very first importance. They are frontier States, and have an unsettled country all west of them; or, if settled at all, it is by Indian savages. Now, the citizens of these States can have no profitable communication with the country west of them; they can have no commerce with it, for the want of a population to settle and improve it, and produce those articles of commerce which are needed for exchanges. We have, now, an outlet for our trade and travel only on one side; and so long as we remain in that condition, we will be unable to develop even the half—perhaps not a tithe—of our resources. We want a market on both sides; we desire to see settlements made west as well as east of us; and it strikes me that is a consideration which should weigh powerfully with the honorable Senator from Texas, [Mr. Rusk,] for his State is similarly situated with mine in this respect.

Mr. RUSK. In what way is it of so much importance?

Mr. BORLAND. It is of importance in this: it will open up the whole country west of us for settlement, trade, and intercommunication. Is not this important and desirable? To me it seems to be not only an important, but the first and indispensable step towards the settlement of the country between our States and California, Oregon, &c. Indeed, the only practicable means by which we can ever establish a line of useful intercommunication between ourselves and our possessions on the Pacific. We have been talking for years about making a railroad across the country, from the Mississippi river to the Pacific ocean. We have had that proposition before us time and again. It is before us now. There is an immense tract of wild country between these points, extending some twelve or fifteen hundred miles, unsettled, or, if settled at all, settled only by savages, amongst whom a railroad would not stand safely at any one point for a week. Without some such plan as this, I know of no mode of building or protecting such a road, except at a cost which all the resources of this Union could not pay.

I beg leave to call the attention of the honorable Senator from Texas to a case in the older States, which, I think, will exemplify the view which I entertain of the advantages, comparative and actual, of an outlet on both sides of a State. I refer to the States of Kentucky and Ohio. Kentucky was settled long before Ohio, with a people equally intelligent and enterprising, and possessing a soil equally fertile, and a climate equally genial and salubrious. Yet, what is the relative condition of these two States?

Ohio became settled, peopled, and improved with more than fourfold rapidity. Why? Ohio has an outlet on both sides, while Kentucky has an outlet on but one. Ohio not only has an outlet and a market on each side, to induce settlement and cultivation throughout her whole territory, but she becomes thereby a thoroughfare between North and South, and all her lines of communication and intercourse are thronged with travelers, and covered with agricultural productions, and the fabrics of exchange, seeking an outlet and a market on both sides, and in opposite directions. Ohio has a great lake on the one side, and a great river on the other. Kentucky has the Ohio river on the one side, and on the other forests and mountains almost impassable, and comparatively impracticable for trade. She has, indeed, an outlet and a market on one side only. The comparative condition of these two States, in the particulars I have mentioned, exemplify the importance and value of the condition of things I desire for my State, and others situated like her, and which I think this proposition of the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. Douglas] is so well calculated—indeed, is indispensable—to attain. We now have no outlet, except upon the Mississippi river. The whole country west of us is comparatively a wilderness. You make us grants of land for railroads; but if you do not allow us facilities for settling the country west, I ask what will these railroads be worth to us? I ask the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. GEYER,] if, when you have made grants of land for railroads in his State, you forbidd settlements being made west of him; or, what is the same thing, refuse your assent to facilities for making and encouraging those settlements, what those grants will be worth to him? Keep the region west of him in its present wild and unsettled condition, and who expects business or travel enough, for years to come, to sustain them with business? Where is the business to come from? So with the other States similarly situated—mine among them. But if you will afford facilities for travel, and open a communication to the Pacific ocean, and encourage white people to travel through and settle in the intermediate country, as they will do, and bring the rich and valuable lands, now wild and waste, into cultivation, you will make business for railroads and all other means of communication, and our States will soon grow, as Ohio has grown, and attain the true position which their natural resources entitle them to occupy. I have mentioned Ohio in particular, because I regard her natural position, with the greatest of our inland seas on one side, and the second of our rivers on the other, as by far more favorable than that of any State in the Union, perhaps New York alone excepted.

Mr. GWIN. If the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BORLAND] will permit me, I will say that I am desirous of going into Executive session. This is a very important matter, and had better lie over until next week.

Mr. BORLAND. If we can get a vote on the subject now, I think we had better do so. If not, I think it would be desirable to fix an early day for the consideration of this important question. I do not desire to make a speech on the subject.

Mr. GWIN. I did not wish to interrupt the Senator; but I was not aware that any expectation was entertained that a vote would be taken on the bill to-day.

Mr. BORLAND. But I did intend to present some views with regard to just such a bill as that presented by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] as affording the only practicable means of establishing a communication with the Pacific, and as the only means by which we can ever hope to unite ourselves properly with our possessions on the Pacific coast, and make them safe in themselves, and valuable to us. But I will not discuss the subject any further now, and shall beg that an early day may be fixed for its consideration.

Mr. DOUGLAS. As the bill is now under consideration, and as I have succeeded in drawing the attention of the Senate to it, I have no objection to postpone it until Tuesday, without making it a special order, and relying on the good feeling of Senators to give it a fair hearing.

Mr. CHASE. I made the motion to postpone the consideration of the bill, because I thought it was the best course to adopt; and I added to it that the bill should be the special order for Tuesday, for the purpose of meeting the wishes of my friend the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] I now withdraw the latter part of my motion.

The motion to postpone was then agreed to.

WASHINGTON GASLIGHT COMPANY.

On motion by Mr. SHIELDS, the Senate postponed the prior order for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Washington Gaslight Company," approved July 8th, 1848. The bill was read for the information of the Senate, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Washington Gaslight Company," approved July 8th, 1848, be, and the same is hereby, amended, by inserting in the second section immediately before the word "fifty," the words "three hundred and;" and in the seventh section, wherever the word "Washington" occurs, by inserting immediately thereafter the words "and Georgetown."

Mr. SHIELDS. I will state that the object of the bill is merely to enable the Gaslight Company to increase their stock. The people of Georgetown are anxious to have the benefits conferred by the Gaslight Company extended to them, as the company has been found to be very useful, and this amendment of the original bill will enable the company to increase its capital.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

PROMOTION OF CERTAIN OFFICERS.

The Senate then, on motion by Mr. SHIELDS, proceeded to the consideration of "A bill to provide for the promotion of certain officers in the Engineer, Topographical Engineer, and Ordnance Corps," as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GWIN. I think the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. JAMES] wishes to be present when that bill is considered, as he has an amendment which he wishes to offer.

Mr. BORLAND. I have the amendment here. The matter is all understood.

The bill provides that every commissioned officer below the rank of captain in the Corps of Engineers, Corps of Topographical Engineers, and Ordnance Corps, who has served fourteen years in either of said corps, shall be promoted to the rank of captain: Provided, That the number of officers in said corps shall not be increased beyond the number fixed by existing laws.

Mr. SHIELDS. I offer the following amendment as a substitute:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever any lieutenant in the Engineer, Topographical Engineer, and Ordnance Corps, shall have served fourteen years continuously as lieutenant, he shall be promoted to the rank of captain: Provided, That the whole number of officers in either of said corps shall not be increased beyond the number now fixed by law: And provided further, That no officer shall be promoted before those who rank in his corps.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was then reported to the Senate as amended, the amendment was concurred in, and the bill ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate, on motion by Mr. GWIN, proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened.

AMOS KNAPP.

Mr. UPHAM. I move that the Senate postpone the prior orders, with the view of taking up House bill No. 60, which is a bill for the relief of Amos Knapp. It was referred to the Committee on Pensions, and has been reported back without amendment.

The motion to postpone the prior orders was agreed to, and the bill was considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that from and after the passage of this act, Amos Knapp shall be placed upon the roll of invalid pensions and receive eight dollars per month, the pension of a common soldier.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and was read a third time and passed.

LANDS OF THE WYANDOT INDIANS.

Mr. CHASE. It is not yet quite three o'clock, and I trust the Senate will indulge me by postponing the prior orders and taking up House bill No. 226. It is an act to amend an act entitled "An act providing for the sale of certain lands in the States of Ohio and Michigan, ceded by the Wyandot tribe of Indians, and for other purposes," approved on the 3d of March, 1843.

The whole object of the bill is simply to authorize the exposure to sale of certain lands ceded by the Wyandots under the treaty concluded with them on the 7th of March. On some of these lands there were improvements, which, however, have not brought the value estimated by the superintendents, and for which reason, according to the old law, they have not been sold. The object of this bill is to authorize their sale at a price of not less than $2 50 per acre.

The question was then taken on the motion to postpone the prior orders, and a division being called for, there were—ayes 14, noes 9; no quorum voting.

Mr. CHASE. There is a quorum in the Chamber, and I trust Senators will vote. This is a matter of considerable importance to one section of the State of Ohio, and I trust the Senate will not refuse to take up the bill.

The question was again taken, and the bill was read a second time, and considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that so much of the fifth section of the act of which this is amendatory, as declares that if, in offering at public sale any tract of land ceded by the Wyandots under the treaty concluded with that tribe on the 7th March, 1842, on which improvements exist, the real value of the same, according to the estimates of the superintendents, shall not be bidden, it shall be their duty to withdraw the tract from sale, and the tracts thus withdrawn from sale shall be offered at public sale, due public notice first being given, be, and the same is hereby repealed; and that all such lands shall be exposed at public sale to the highest bidder, at such time and place as the Commissioner of the General Land Office may direct, subject to the minimum price per acre of $2 50.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and was read a third time and passed.

GRANT OF LAND IN ARKANSAS.

The bill "granting to the State of Arkansas the right of way and a portion of the public lands, to aid in the construction of a railroad from 'Gaines's Landing to Fulton, in said State,'" was taken up for a third reading.

Mr. BRADBURY. I do not intend to oppose the passage of this bill; but I wish to inquire of the Senator from Arkansas, whether this is the first, second, third, or fourth bill which grants lands to that State, to aid in the construction of railroads?

Mr. BORLAND. I will state to the Senator from Maine, that this is the second bill that has been reported for Arkansas, and that upon an estimate which I have in my desk, it appears that less land will still have been granted to Arkansas, for the same purpose, than has been granted to other States, when this is granted.

Mr. BRADBURY. I made the inquiry because I had the impression that this was the third railroad for which land had been granted in Arkansas. I thought the Committee on Public Lands had adopted the principle of giving land for two railroads in each State, at this session, reserving further action till another session; but as this is only the second, I will say nothing further.

The bill was read a third time, and passed.

SAFETY OF PASSENGERS ON STEAMBOATS.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to say to the Senate, that the bill we acted upon yesterday, as in Committee of the Whole, is now printed, with the amendments, and is in the Capitol. I wish also to say one word in explanation. I did whatever I could do to have this printing done in season for action to-day. I had a promise that it should be here by twelve o'clock, but I have understood, by the Secretary, that whatever effort could be made has been made to have it here. I will merely say, that it is ready for action whenever it is the desire of the Senate to take it up. I shall not move to take it up to-day.

Mr. ADAMS. I move that we proceed to its consideration now. We have yet an hour during which we might consider it; and as to-morrow is private bill day, if it is not taken up to-day, we shall not get it up again this week.

Mr. CHASE. I hope it will not be proceeded with to-day. The bill has not yet been laid upon our tables, and we want a little time to consider it.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand the bill, as printed, is now in the Capitol.

The question was taken on the motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill, and it was not agreed to.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, July 8, 1852.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by the Rev. L. F. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. House bill No. 144, to amend the act entitled "An act to reduce and modify the rates of postage," reported on Tuesday last from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, with sundry amendments, having been postponed until to-day, is the first business in order; the pending question being on the amendments proposed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. OLDS. I wish to say, with regard to that bill, that the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] called upon me for some statistics in relation to the postage under the existing law. The gentleman from New York will readily understand that it is impossible for me to get them, when I tell him that there are more than seventy-odd rates of postage under the law, and probably there are not more than one in a hundred postmasters in the country that can give the information. Some statistics from the Post Office Department were to be here at eleven o'clock to-day, but have not yet come. If the House choose, I would prefer, under the circumstances, to postpone the bill until to-morrow morning. I have another reason for doing so; the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Grey] desires to make a report from our committee, that it may be read before the vote is taken upon the Collins line of steamers. It is a proposition for establishing another line of steamers from New York to London, by the way of Galway, Ireland, and for carrying the mail at a round trip, for a sum not exceeding $10,000.

The question was then taken upon Mr. Old's motion, and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

MAIL LINE TO GALWAY.

Mr. GREY, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which were referred the proposals of Horace B. Tibbets, made a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (No. 295) "to authorize the Postmaster General to contract for the transportation of the mails between Jersey City, port of New York, and Galway, in Ireland," which was read a first and second time, committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the bill and the report ordered to be printed.

MARY REESIDE.

Mr. OLDS, from the same committee, to which was referred the petition of Mary Reeside, administratrix of James Reeside, deceased, made a report thereon, accompanied by a joint resolution for her relief; which was read a first and second time, committed to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and the joint resolution and report ordered to be printed.

JOHN J. SYKES.

Mr. FOWLER, from the same committee, to which was referred the petition of John J. Sykes, made a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (No. 296) for his relief; which was read a first and second time, committed to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. FOWLER, it was Ordered, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of R. J. Lawrenson and others, mail agents of the United States, praying increase of compensation, and that the same be laid on the table.

OCEAN MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. OLDS, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported the following resolutions; which were read, considered, and agreed to, viz:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to transmit to this House a copy of any and all contracts for the transportation of the United States mail, oceanwise, between New York and San Francisco; also a schedule of the time allowed by the Post Office Department for the transportation of said mails, under existing arrangements, between the points above named; also an abstract showing the time at which said mails departed and arrived from and at New York and San Francisco, on each semi-monthly trip performed within the last three months.

Resolved further, That the Postmaster General be directed to transmit to this House any information, if such there be, in possession of the Post Office Department, establishing the fact, that there is now in successful operation one ocean route between New York and San Francisco, affording the opportunity for the transportation of the United States mails between these points, with greater economy and dispatch, than are now afforded via Chagres and Panama.

Also, what offers, if any, are now before the Post Office Department for the transportation of the United States mails between New York and San Francisco, on ocean routes other than by Chagres and Panama. How much time could be gained, and how much money saved, if any, by contracting for the transportation of the United States mails, on such ocean routes, in accordance with such offers.

Resolved further, That the Postmaster General be directed to inform the House what falling off, if any, there has been in the revenues of the Post Office Department, upon the Chagres and Panama route, from New York to San Francisco, within the last eight months; also, what proportion of such falling off in the revenue is to be ascribed to the reduced rates of postage under the operation of the act of the 3d of March, entitled "An act to reduce and modify the rates of postage," &c.; and what proportion to the transportation of letters by private expresses outside the United States mail, by the same steamers which carry the United States mail under existing contracts; and what proportion to the transportation of letters, by private expresses upon shorter and more expeditious ocean routes than the one by Chagres and Panama.

MAIL STEAMERS.

Mr. OLDS, from the same committee, reported the following resolutions:

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to transmit to this House copies of all the contracts and supplemental contracts for the construction of naval mail steamers and the transportation of the mails between New York and San Francisco, made by the Navy Department, or by the Navy Department in conjunction with the Post Office Department, on behalf of the United States.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be also requested to inform this House whether A. G. Sloo, contractor for the transportation of the ocean-steamers mails from New York to Chagres, or his assigns, have constructed and placed in the service of the United States Government the number of steamships required by the contract of the said Sloo; and, if not, how many thereof the said contractor and his assigns have failed to furnish.

Resolved further, That the Secretary of the Navy be also requested to inform this House what amount of money has been advanced to the said Sloo, or his assigns, under the act of August 3d, 1848, to aid in the construction of their steamships, stating the date and amount of each such advance, and the date and amount of each repayment of said advances so far made by the said A. G. Sloo, or his assigns.

Be it also resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be also requested to inform this House whether the steamships employed by the two companies of contractors for carrying the mails between New York and San Francisco have been built according to the obligations of the contracts under which they were constructed; whether they are so built as to be fit to carry batteries proportionate to the respective tonnage of each such steamships; and also, whether his Department could employ the entire services of the said steamships with advantage to the United States Navy, and to the general interest of the Government.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee: I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Olds] whether the information asked for in that resolution is not covered by one that was passed some time since upon the motion of the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. Peaslee?]

Mr. OLDS. I will say, in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, that this resolution was drawn up before that was proposed to the House, and that the response to that resolution does not embrace the whole of the information which we seek to obtain. It is true that some portion of it covers the same ground; but it will be no trouble to the Department to furnish it again.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am satisfied that if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Olds] will refer to the documents, he will find at least four fifths, if not all, of his information already in two or three documents which are before the two Houses of Congress. One of these resolutions asks for information in relation to the Sloo line, and as to the amount of money paid. If the gentleman will examine the document of this House, No. 91, he will find the precise information from the proper Department. One of those resolutions asks for a copy of the contract, and by a reference to the same document it will be found that the contracts are all here. The gentleman also asks, in another of these resolutions, for the amount of revenue. The amount of revenue is given in several tables in this document, and in the document of the Senate, which I hold in my hand. Almost the entire amount of the gentleman's information is now very clumsily printed, and before the two Houses of Congress, and really much more so than was needed.

If the gentleman chooses to allow his resolution to lie over, and will look to the documents, he will find, I think, every particle of the information he seeks. Another resolution inquires whether the number of ships contracted for have been put upon the line. That, too, is specifically answered by the published documents; and also as to their commission, where built, how and when they were examined, by whom, and when they were accepted by the Government. All the information, from what I could catch of the resolution in hearing it read, is contained in these documents. I think, therefore, he had better let the resolution lie over.

Mr. OLDS. I am aware, as I said before, that a large portion of the information has been given to the House since the committee ordered these resolutions to be reported; but there are points embraced in these resolutions which have not been given by the Secretary of the Navy. If it will be any trouble to the Department to communicate the information again, I am willing that the resolution shall be referred back to the committee.

Mr. HOUSTON. That will be the better way. Let the committee reexamine it. I move that the resolution be recommitted to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

ELIZABETH F. THURSTON.

Mr. OLDS, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which was referred a joint resolution for the relief of Elizabeth F. Thurston, of the Territory of Oregon, reported back the same without amendment, and with a recommendation that it be passed.

The resolution was read through.

Mr. O. said: I will state briefly to the House the reasons why the widow of Mr. Thurston seeks to obtain this relief from the Congress of the United States. The Hon. Mr. Thurston, a Delegate in the last Congress from Oregon, under his official franks, sent from here to his residence in the Territory of Oregon, a large number of books, embracing mostly the books that were ordered to be given to the new members of Congress. From the information before us we have no doubt but that there were, perhaps, among those books a few that would not have been covered, and ought not to have been sent under his official frank. Let me say, however, that the same steamer that brought these books to the post office in Lynn City, brought to that city the news of the death of Mr. Thurston. The postmaster at that city refused to deliver these books to the widow of Thurston, alleging that among them there were some that Mr. Thurston had no right to frank.

Now, sir, the committee are satisfied that the postmaster at Lynn did not fully understand the franking privilege. For instance, from a communication published by him in the paper at Lynn City upon this subject, he takes it for granted that Mr. Thurston had no right to frank any book weighing over two pounds. Now it is known to all members of Congress that the Archives, the Congressional Globe, and, in fact, a great portion of the books that were voted by Congress to new members exceed that weight, and Mr. Thurston had the privilege of franking them under his official frank. The committee, although they had information before them that Mr. Thurston did frank a few books that he had no right to frank, are satisfied that a large portion, indeed nearly all of them, were covered by the resolution of Congress, and they therefore desire that the resolution may be passed, and the postmaster directed to deliver these books to the widow of Mr. Thurston. Perhaps Mr. Thurston did not altogether understand how far his franking privilege extended. I ask that the resolution be put upon its passage.

The resolution was then ordered to a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts. Upon the statement made by the chairman of the Post Office and Post Roads Committee, it seems to me that the word "pretense" in the resolution is not a proper word to be used. I move to amend it by substituting the word "allegation."

Mr. OLDS. I have no objection to the amendment. I will accept it.

The SPEAKER. The amendment can only be made by unanimous consent, the resolution having passed the stage for amendments.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered.

The resolution was then passed.

Mr. FOWLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table, which latter motion was agreed to.

J. P. CONVERSE.

Mr. OLDS, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a joint resolution for the relief of J. P. Converse; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed.

WHEELING BRIDGE CASE.

Mr. OLDS. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which was referred the memorial of the Belmont and Wheeling Bridge Company, have directed me to make a report upon that subject, accompanied by a bill.

Mr. THOMAS M. HOWE. Will the chairman of the committee allow me to ask him whether the bill which he proposes to report contains any provision for regulating the height of chimneys of steamboats? If so, I wish to raise a question of order.

Mr. OLDS. Let the bill be read first.

The bill having been read a first time by its title, was read through for information, as follows, viz :

A Bill declaring the Wheeling Bridges lawful structures, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the bridges across the Ohio river at Wheeling, in the State of Virginia, and at Bridgeport, in the State of Ohio, abutting on Zane's Island, in said river, are hereby declared to be lawful structures in their present position and elevation, and shall be so held and taken to be, anything in any law or laws of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding.

And be it further enacted, That the said bridges are declared to be, and are established post roads, for the passage of the mails of the United States, and that the Wheeling and Belmont Bridge Company are authorized to have and maintain their said bridges at their present site and elevation, and the officers and crew of all vessels and boats navigating said river are required to regulate the use of their said vessels and boats, and of any pipes or chimneys belonging thereto, so as not to interfere with the elevation and construction of said bridges.

Mr. THOMAS M. HOWE. The point of order which I proposed making is this: The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads being authorized by the 85th rule of the House to take into consideration only such petitions and matters or things touching the Post Office and Post Roads as shall be presented or may come in question and be referred to them by the House, it is not competent for said committee to report a bill, or section of a bill, regulating the structure of vessels and boats navigating a river, or in any way to prescribe limitations to the height and use of the pipes and chimneys of such boats, inasmuch as such proposed action would be a regulation of commerce, and therefore foreign to the duties of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

With the indulgence of the Chair, I beg leave to refer to a precedent. Some six or eight weeks ago, when it was proposed by the Committee on Public Lands to report a bill authorizing a railroad to import iron free of duty, a point of order was raised by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means that the committee had traveled out of the line of its duties. It appears to me that analogy will hold good in this case, and therefore I respectfully submit, for the consideration of the Speaker, the point of order that I have raised.

Mr. OLDS. With the permission of the Chair, I desire to reply for a single moment to the objection which has been raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be pleased to hear the gentleman.

Mr. OLDS. It is true, sir, that the House in that case decided that the Committee on Public Lands had no right to report upon the subject of limiting the duty upon railroad iron; and for what reason? Why, for the express reason that the matter had not been referred to them by the House, and that that committee had no right to take into consideration the duty upon railroad iron, unless the House directed them to do so. But the analogy does not hold good in this case, for the subject-matter of this bill was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads by the House, and we are acting under the authority of the House when we make this report.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I should like to hear the petition or resolution read under which the committee acted.

Mr. OLDS. If the gentleman wishes to have the petitions read, I will send to the committee room for them, but it will take at least three days to read them all.

Mr. STEVENS. The reading of one petition will be sufficient, and I should like to hear it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recollects very well that various petitions upon the subject of the Wheeling bridge were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. STEVENS. I want the gentleman to show me any petitions which ask the committee to regulate the height of chimneys, or the structure of steamboats. I suppose the gentleman has them. I hope we shall not proceed further with this matter until the gentleman can produce them.

Mr. OLDS. I will say, on my responsibility as a member, that is one of the very things upon which the Bridge Company have memorialized Congress, and their memorial was referred to us.

The SPEAKER. That being the state of the case, the Chair must overrule the objection raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] and decide that this bill is in order; the House having referred that particular subject to that particular committee.

Mr. CARTTER. I would like to see the petitions.

Mr. FOWLER. As a member of the committee who reported this bill, I feel myself constrained, as have two other members of the committee, to present a minority report, which I wish to take the same course as the majority report.

The bill was then read a second time by its title.

The SPEAKER. What disposition does the gentleman propose to make of the bill?

Mr. OLDS. I propose, inasmuch as it is important that action should be had upon this matter by Congress soon, if at all, to put the bill upon its passage. I do not desire, however, to move the previous question, because I am willing it should receive such discussion as the House can give to the subject during the morning hour. But I desire that the bill may not be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, because the order of the court is, that this bridge must be removed by the first of February next. If the matter is passed by at this session of Congress, there will not be time for the company to act.

Mr. McLANAHAN. If it be in order, I move now to refer this bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that it be printed.

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order.

Mr. OLDS. It is printed.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I will take this occasion to remark to the House, that at an early period in the present session, resolutions passed by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and approved by the Governor of that State, were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and about the same time, sundry memorials purporting to be from citizens of the State of Pennsylvania, were also referred to the same committee; that committee have had this subject under consideration, and it must be evident to the House, that the questions embraced in the case are eminently of a judicial character.

It is now some three or four months since the Committee on the Judiciary have been called upon for reports. They are prepared to report upon this subject. It is one of wide and grave importance, and the object I have in view in making the motion that I have just submitted, to refer this bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, is to enable the Committee on the Judiciary to make their report and to have it printed, and laid upon the desks of the members of the House.

The chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads has already indicated the character of the questions that are involved. They are questions of vast magnitude—questions that command, and should receive from this House its most serious consideration.

Having stated that this question has been before the Committee on the Judiciary, and that it is properly, and eminently a question for their consideration, and as the period has not yet arrived for them to lay their views upon the subject before the House, I trust that the motion which I have just made will be adopted by the House, and that this bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and printed.

Mr. FOWLER. I stated just now, that two of my colleagues, with myself, have prepared and wish to present a minority report. If the bill and the report of the majority are to be printed, we ask that the minority report may take the same course and be printed with them.

Mr. OLDS. I suppose that it is in order to receive the minority report in connection with the majority report?

Mr. CARTTER. I wish to inquire if the morning hour has expired?

The SPEAKER. It has not. The gentleman from Massachusetts proposes to make a minority report from the committee, and asks that it be laid upon the table and be printed.

Mr. OLDS. I have a word to say in regard to the printing. Inasmuch as the committee designed asking the House to put the bill upon its passage, they had the report printed; it has been circulated and laid upon the desks of members; the minority of the committee have done the same thing with their report. The two reports have been printed, and are now before the House, and there is therefore no necessity for printing them again.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire that the minority report, with the majority report, may appear on the files, and I hope, therefore, that we shall order them to be printed. I hope that they will be printed as a part of the documentary evidence in this case.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I hope that both the reports may be printed, that it will appear that they were ordered to be printed, and that they may go among the printed documents. I do not understand this mode of printing beforehand by order of the committee.

Mr. OLDS. I have no objection to the printing if it does not delay the action of the House upon the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. Oh, we shall have time enough to act upon it.

Mr. FOWLER. I wish to state that the reports have not been printed by order of the committee. Not at all.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, I want them printed now by order of the House.

Mr. FOWLER. They were printed for the sake of convenience.

Mr. OLDS. Is the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union debatable?

The SPEAKER. The motion is to lay the report upon the table, and print it.

Mr. OLDS. The minority report?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that to be the motion made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. FOWLER.]

Mr. FOWLER. I wish the minority report to take the same course as the majority report.

Mr. STEVENS. I understand that my colleague [Mr. McLANAHAN] moved that the bill and the report be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and be printed.

The SPEAKER. That is the pending motion, but it relates to the bill and the majority report.

Mr. OLDS. Is the motion divisible, so as to take a separate vote on the printing and on the reference?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. OLDS. Then I call for a division of the question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Massachusetts proposes that the minority report shall take the same direction as the majority report. The pending motion, therefore, is, that the bill and the reports be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and be printed.

Mr. WALSH. I want to say but a few words to the House. I hope the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McLANAHAN] will not prevail, because the effect of it must be to render the proposed legislation of no value. As was stated by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. OLDS,] in February next, under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, this bridge is to be removed. The object in defeating this bill—and I mean no offense to anybody—is not to sustain a few steamboats that have been prevented from going under this bridge, but I believe the ultimate object is to prevent the bridge being used on a line of railroad. But no matter what may be the object of the motion, it can lead to but one result, and that is, to defeat this bill. Now, the House has all the facts of the case in these two reports from the committee. If you want to compel those gentlemen, who have built this bridge without any complaint against it until it was finished, to take it down, why say so at once.

Mr. FOWLER. The gentleman is slightly in error in regard to one point. The suit which has issued in the Supreme Court was commenced some time before the bridge was completed.

Mr. WALSH. That may be. That is not the statement, however, on which I rely. I understand that is the statement upon your side of the question; but these gentlemen of the company say they never heard a word of complaint until the bridge was finished, or, at least, until they had spent the greatest portion of the money on it.

Mr. GROW. It was in evidence in the Supreme Court, that this injunction was served on them before they put the cables across the river.

Mr. WALSH. Well, sir, however that may be, let us take the vote upon it without sending it to the committee. That is all I want. Let us see whether this bridge is a nuisance, under the decision of the Supreme Court, because a few steamboats are prevented by it from going up the river to Pittsburg. If it is a nuisance, why then do not pass this bill. But do not put it off to a period when we know it cannot be reached, and when the company will be reached by the process of the Supreme Court. I hope a vote will be taken on the bill in the House.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I think this subject is of sufficient importance to be deliberately considered. The gentleman from Maryland jumps at conclusions, and is possessed of facts which I do not know to exist, and which I am inclined to think do not exist.

Sir, the gentleman speaks of this as if it were a trivial matter. Does he remember that the commerce of that vast river is equal to all that of the port of Baltimore? And is this House to rejudge the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States per saltum, and without a deliberate examination of this question and ample argument? Sir, this matter has been for two years under examination—Chancellor Walworth, perhaps the ablest man in the State of New York, has examined it carefully, upon the spot; engineers have been employed at vast expense, to examine it, and all this is to be swept away with a flourish of rhetoric.

Mr. WALSH, (interrupting.) I did not say the matter was not to be discussed in the House. I only want to defeat the motion of the gentleman's colleague, [Mr. McLANAHAN,] because if this bill goes to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it will never be reached.

Mr. STEVENS. It is worth sending where all such questions go, and where it can be deliberately examined. Why, this is a summary way of overthrowing the adjudication of the Supreme Court!

Mr. OLDS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. STEVENS. Certainly I will.

Mr. OLDS. The gentleman thinks that because this is an important matter, it ought to be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I should like to know if the gentleman did not vote to give away sixty millions of acres of the public lands, without any reference of that bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

Mr. STEVENS. That is a kind of argument which I have known some gentlemen use when they knew no other argument. Now, I did not vote for any such thing, and if I had, that is but a shallow kind of question to put when we are arguing a matter of this kind. Was it ever moved to send that bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union? Did I ever vote against it? or did any other gentleman do it? But that is an episode—a very small episode. I say that here is a question which the Supreme Court of the United States have been engaged in examining for years; they have appointed examiners of the highest character and of the greatest skill; they have taken volumes of testimony, which, if this House means to act intelligently, it must examine; they have adjudicated—

Mr. COBB, (interrupting.) The morning hour has expired; and I therefore move to proceed to the business on the Speaker's table, with a view that we may refer the bills which are upon it to the respective committees.

Mr. ROBBINS. Is it in order now to move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

Mr. ROBBINS. Then I make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania could not have taken the floor from his colleague, [Mr. STEVENS,] while the motion made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] could have done it, and therefore that the question must first be put upon the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HUNTER. I wish to inquire of the Chair, if the bill in relation to the Wheeling bridge case will come up the first thing to-morrow morning?

The SPEAKER. It will be the first business in order during the morning hour.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to make a suggestion to the House, which, I think, will meet with general concurrence. By going into committee this morning, the presumption is, that we can get through with the deficiency bill to-day, which is greatly to be desired. If we appropriate an hour or two to the business on the Speaker's table, we shall not be able to finish the deficiency bill to-day, and it will probably consume the whole of to-morrow.

Mr. COBB. I can obviate that difficulty by withdrawing my motion, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] will yield the floor for a motion to go into committee.

Mr. STEVENS. Certainly; I yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. COBB. I now move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

So the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. STUART in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated, as the business before the committee, the consideration of the Senate amendments to House bill No. 207, "to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1852." The pending amendment of the Senate, proposed to the clause of the original bill, which provides for the payment of interest on the amount awarded to the Choctaw claimants, under the fourteenth article of the treaty of Dancing Rabbit Creek, in 1830, was then read, as follows:

"Provided, That after the 30th day of June, 1852, all payments of interest on said awards shall cease, and that the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby directed to pay said claimants the amount of principal awarded in each case respectively, and that the amount necessary for this purpose be, and the same is hereby appropriated: Provided further, That the final payment and satisfaction of said awards shall be first ratified and approved as a final release of all claims of such parties, under the fourteenth article of said treaty, by the proper national authority of the Choctaws, in such form as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior."

Mr. HOUSTON. The Committee on Ways and Means propose to amend that amendment of the Senate by inserting, on page twenty of the printed bill, line seventh of the amendment, after the word "appropriated," the words "not exceeding $872,000."

The amendment is intended, as will be seen at once by every member of the committee, to make the item proposed to be appropriated specific of itself. I did not regard the amendment proposed by the committee as important, but the committee did. It certainly does not do any harm. The $872,000 is the exact amount that is due under the treaty referred to.

Mr. HUNTER. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means a question in relation to this amendment. I see that in this bill a provision is made for the payment of the interest of the last fiscal year, and this other provision that the principal shall be now paid. Again, I find in the Indian appropriation bill an appropriation made for paying the interest for the present fiscal year. I wish to know why that provision was put in the Indian appropriation bill for paying the interest on a principal, which principal, by the provision of this bill, is to be paid now?

Mr. HOUSTON. The reason why the Committee on Ways and Means inserted in the regular Indian appropriation bill a provision for paying the interest for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1853, upon the amounts awarded to the Choctaw Indians, was, that there was no proposition before the committee, when they reported the Indian bill, for the payment of the principal. That bill was reported to the House early in January, I think, very long before the bill now under consideration was reported. This amendment, proposing to pay up the principal and stop the interest, now comes from the Senate. If we agree to and pass this amendment, why, as a matter of course, when we come to the Indian bill, the appropriation therein, which has been referred to by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HUNTER] must be stricken out. I do not see the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] who told me yesterday that he had an amendment which he desired to propose to this amendment of the Senate. I will ask a vote upon the amendment proposed by the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to strike out from the amendment offered by the committee, the sum of $872,000, and I do it for the purpose of stating one or two reasons why I shall support the amendment. By our treaty with the Choctaw Indians, we owe them $872,000. Upon that amount we are, and have been, paying interest at the rate of five per cent. from the time the stock became due, to them, under the treaty, down to the present time; and we must continue to pay that interest until this amount of principal is paid, which of course will at some time have to be paid. My rule is, that it is always best, in public as well as in private affairs, to pay our debts when we have the money, and thus stop the interest. As we must at some time pay this debt, and as we have as much money in the Treasury now as we probably will have at any future time, and this being one of the debts which we have a right to pay without paying premium upon it, I think it is a sound policy to make this appropriation, and thereby liquidate the debt, and stop the interest.

I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. Allow me to say to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] that I only ask now that the amendment proposed by the committee shall be voted upon, and then the amendment will be open to amendment.

Mr. JONES. I withdraw my motion to amend.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know what the amendment of the committee is. I want to make a statement in regard to this matter. Perhaps I do not understand it, but I think I do. This provision, Mr. Chairman, passed by the Senate, provides for the payment of $872,000, under the fourteenth article of the treaty of 1832, with the Choctaw Indians. That treaty provides that the first payment of $872,000 was to be paid previous to the removal of the Indians west of the Mississippi river. The last $872,000 was not to be paid until after they should have emigrated west of that river.

According to the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, there are some eleven hundred Choctaw Indians not yet removed west. If this amendment should pass, and this money be appropriated, it would be a virtual violation of the treaty, and it does not accomplish the object that was designed in appropriating the $872,000, for the eleven hundred Indians remain unmoved to the west of the Mississippi.

In addition to that, this money is not asked for by the Choctaw nation; and I desire to offer an amendment, which I will now have read, and which will explain very fully my object. I desire the Clerk to read the amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. I should like to have a vote taken upon the amendment, and then let my friend from Tennessee [Mr. WILLIAMS] offer his amendment. Let the vote be taken, so that we may be able to make progress in this matter.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to have the amendment read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can have his amendment read for information, during the five minutes to which he is entitled.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman has no ground for making a five minutes speech. I do not want to be captious; but, on the contrary, want to hear him; but let us proceed in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I withdraw my amendment for the present.

The question was then taken on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Ways and Means; and it was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I offer, as an amendment to the amendment as it now stands, what I send to the Clerk's table.

The proposed amendment was read, as follows:

"Provided further, That said amount of $872,000 shall not be paid until after the entire removal of the Indians west of the Mississippi, and then to such only as signify their desire, through the Choctaw agent, to have the same paid, and that the amount due to orphans shall not be paid until they arrive at the age of twenty-one years."

Mr. WILLIAMS. It will be perceived by the committee that the simple object I have in view in proposing that amendment is, that the treaty stipulation shall be complied with, before any of this money, under the act appropriating it, shall be paid—to wit, that the Indians shall be removed west of the Mississippi river. It is understood that the Choctaw nation is asking, through her delegation here, that this money should be paid; hence I provide, whenever the persons having a right to claim under the treaty, desire the payment, they shall make known that fact, and signify to the agent their desire to have it paid; and, lastly, that to those who are under age, the Government of the United States, the guardian for the Indians, shall not pay the money until they arrive at the age of twenty-one years. But the interest that accrues upon it is properly and justly due to the minor Indians.

By adopting this amendment, sir, the appropriation of $43,000, in the Indian appropriation bill, with a slight modification, will be proper to pass. But if that amendment is rejected, and the $872,000 under the treaty is ordered peremptorily to be paid, of course the $43,000 in that Indian bill, with interest until June 30, 1853, should be stricken out.

Mr. HOUSTON. Of course that will be stricken out.

Mr. WILLIAMS. As many of the Choctaw Indians as have removed west of the Mississippi river can, by making it known, receive their money, under the provisions of this bill; but is it proper that this $872,000 shall be appropriated in this side-bar manner, without examination, without investigation, and without a compliance upon the part of the Indians, with the treaty stipulations? Why this hot haste to pay a debt that we owe? Have the terms of the treaty been complied with? Not at all. If they have been complied with, then I insist that this Government being the guardian of the minor Indians, would be violating their duty in paying this money into the hands of irresponsible persons, thus to be wasted.

Mr. HOUSTON. The chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs is not here, but he feels a great interest in having this amendment agreed to substantially, as it is now, after being amended by the adoption of the amendment recommended by the Committee on Ways and Means. I do not myself think the question is free from embarrassment, but there are difficulties in taking either course.

In the first place, this amount of money proceeds from one half of the land scrip which was due to the Choctaw Indians upon their removal west. With a view to secure their removal, the Government agreed to give them a certain amount of land. The land they did not get, and the Government then agreed to give them scrip at the rate of $1 25 per acre. That the Government did. One half of the scrip was deliverable to them at their old home, and the other half when they should have removed to their new homes west of the Mississippi. The half of the scrip, which they have already received, has been expended, and is gone. Most of the Indians have removed, in pursuance of the terms of the treaty, west of the Mississippi river. There still remain, as remarked by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] some ten or eleven hundred, in the State of Mississippi.

The proposition now is to pay to these Indians the money for this scrip, and let them use it as they please. The gentleman is mistaken in the view he presents, that this provision requires that the nation, in its national authority, shall give its assent to the payment of the money, before it shall be paid.

I think this money should be paid, and the interest be stopped. I do not, however, speak of this matter merely in a pecuniary point of view. Whatever is fair, and proper, and right, I wish to do. The greatest number of acres ever given to any one Indian, was a half section, three hundred and twenty acres, which, when land scrip was substituted therefor, amounted to but $400. Others received various amounts, from $400 down to $200, and some, I believe, less. These amounts were due to the heads of families. In very many cases, probably hundreds, the heads of families have died, leaving heirs, some of age and some not of age, and now the amount of interest going to them under the treaty, in very many cases, is from a dollar and a quarter to two dollars per head to those who are entitled. That amount is not worth coming here for, it is not worth sending for, and it is not worth going to an agent to collect.

Mr. HUNTER, (interrupting.) I wish to ask the gentleman if it is not expressly provided by the terms of the treaty, that the money shall not be paid until all the Indians are removed?

Mr. HOUSTON. The terms of the treaty are that it shall be paid after the Indians shall have removed west. There are some who have not gone west. That is the difficulty in the way. But the Government of the United States, if it finds that it will be for the benefit of the Indians to do so, may release that provision of the treaty. The operation of the provisions of this treaty seems to be becoming vexatious, because it requires the agent to pay to so many, and in such small sums, and to the heirs of particular Indians, oftentimes requiring proof.

Mr. WILLIAMS, (interrupting.) What is the amount as proposed to be distributed by the Senate amendment?

Mr. HOUSTON. Eight hundred and seventy-two thousand dollars.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is not a very small sum.

Mr. HOUSTON. The very largest amount that goes to any one Indian, under that provision of the treaty relating to this scrip, is $400, and if an Indian dies who is entitled to that amount, leaving half a dozen children, the interest on that $400, which, at five per cent., is twenty dollars, is to be distributed among all those children.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to state, simply, that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs has asked for $75,000 to remove these Indians. What inducement will they have to go west if this amendment is not adopted? None whatever. I ask for tellers upon the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. HOWARD. That amendment will defeat the whole subject of the Senate amendment.

A division was taken on the demand for tellers, and they were not ordered.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the amendment offered by Mr. WILLIAMS, and there were, on a division—ayes 27, noes 79; no quorum voting.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. By unanimous consent of the committee the vote may be taken by tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and Messrs. CHANDLER and HARRIS of Tennessee, were appointed.

The question was again put on the amendment, and it was not adopted, the tellers having reported—ayes 44, noes 82.

The question then recurred on the amendment of the Senate, as amended; which was adopted.

The fourteenth amendment of the Senate was read, viz:

“Strike out the following:

“For compensation to three special agents and four interpreters for the Indian tribes of Texas, and for the purchase of presents, and to negotiate with said Indians, under instructions from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, for their removal from that State to some designated unoccupied territory of the United States, $25,000.”

“And insert in lieu thereof the following, viz:

“For the purchase of presents, and to negotiate, under instructions from the Secretary of the Interior, with the Indians in Texas, who have intruded themselves into that State from the territories of the United States, for their removal from that State, $25,000.”

Mr. HOUSTON. I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to move an amendment to the amendment of the Senate. I ask the attention of the House to it. I move to strike out of the amendment, from the word “who,” in the third line, to the word “States,” in the fourth line inclusive, so that the Senate’s amendment, if amended, will read:

For the purchase of presents, and to negotiate, under instructions from the Secretary of the Interior, with the Indians in Texas, for their removal from that State, $25,000.

The object of the Committee on Ways and Means in moving to strike out these words must be apparent. This amount of money was intended by the House to embrace also another object, which the Senate has thought proper to strike out of the bill. That body considered this sum necessary for the purpose of removing the Indians from the State of Texas, if they can be induced to remove at all, to some place where the Government of the United States can have proper control over them. The relations between this Government, the State of Texas, and the Indian tribes within that State, are very complicated and unsatisfactory; and those relations, I fear, can never be improved until this Government removes those tribes, and puts them in its own territory, and in that way avoid conflicting claims of jurisdiction between that State and the Federal Government. Questions of jurisdiction, as well as other perplexing questions, present themselves in our management of those tribes, and always will, unless we withdraw them from the jurisdiction of that State. This appropriation is intended to accomplish that object, and the Committee on Ways and Means thought it best to strike out those words, which restricted the appropriation to the particular tribes specified in the Senate’s amendment, so that it might apply to all the tribes in that State, that we might free ourselves from the perplexity and trouble so often growing out of our Indian relations in that State, and at the same time stop, at least to some extent, an unnecessary expense, and save our frontier citizens from frequent outrages and depredations upon their persons as well as their property.

Mr. FITCH. I do not know that there is any real objection to the amendment of the Senate, as modified by the Committee on Ways and Means, unless there be an actual deficiency for the payment of certain officers in Texas, as provided in the original House bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. The House originally appropriated, in the bill which they sent to the Senate, $15,000, for the purpose of paying special agents in Texas. Ten thousand dollars were added on the motion, I believe, of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] or of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. FITCH,] intended to enable the proper Department to negotiate with those tribes of Indians for their removal from that State, and in that way the appropriation was increased to $25,000. After the bill had passed this House, it was ascertained that the Indian Department had committed an error in estimating $15,000 for special agents in Texas, that sum having been appropriated in the civil and diplomatic bill, and not in the regular Indian bill. It is true, however, that the appropriation was made for special agents in Texas, for the year ending 30th June, 1852, and it is also true that there is no deficiency wanted for that object, and that the item was properly stricken from the bill. I presume the reason why the error was committed by the Indian Office, is because the appropriation was made by the last Congress in the wrong bill.

Mr. FITCH. That explanation is entirely satisfactory.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. HOUSTON, and it was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the amendment of the Senate as amended; which was agreed to.

The fifteenth amendment of the Senate was agreed to, viz:

“Insert in page 9, after the clause appropriating $17,000 for continuing the collection of statistics and other information, authorized by the act of 3d March, 1847, the following proviso:

“Provided, That the work shall be completed in five volumes, and at least one volume shall be published in each year until the whole series of five volumes shall be finished.”

The sixteenth amendment of the Senate was agreed to, viz:

“In page 10, line 226, strike out the word ‘Indians,’ and insert ‘Indiana,’ in lieu thereof.”

The seventeenth amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

“For the reappropriation of $10,000 for the redemption of outstanding loan-office and final-settlement certificates, this being a portion of the sum of $37,589 59 heretofore appropriated for that purpose, and carried to the surplus fund on the 31st day of December, 1843: Provided, That hereafter all claims on account of such loan-office and final-settlement certificates, unless presented at the Treasury of the United States within two years from the passage of this act, shall be considered as barred, and not thereafter payable.”

Mr. HOUSTON. The Committee on Ways and Means recommend the adoption of an amendment to that amendment, to strike out all after the word “the” in the first line. The $10,000 appropriation there made is for the purpose of redeeming these outstanding loan-office and final-settlement certificates. The Committee on Ways and Means called on the proper Department, and ascertained the amount that was presented for payment. They now propose, in lieu of what is moved to be stricken out, the actual amount that is before the Treasury Department for payment.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "the," in the first line of the Senate's amendment, and in lieu thereof, to insert the following:

Redemption of outstanding loan-office and final-settlement certificate, dated September 9th, 1779, countersigned by Nathaniel Appleton, commissioner of Massachusetts Bay, issued for $200, specie value $10 78-19, $57 72."

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I think there must be some great mistake about this business. For the last several years the committee in this House have reported bills retransferring and reappropriating the sum of $24,500 for the objects specified in this clause of the bill. Now, sir, there are certainly $20,000 or $30,000 outstanding, and if the Department have reported no more than the amount mentioned, it is because they did not know where to look for it. I have had sent to me, within a week, an unpaid certificate for $4,000 currency, which is outstanding. I have it at home. I did not bring it down. Now, sir, there are more than $24,000 of loan-office certificates still unpaid, in my judgment the most meritorious class of claims. The only reason they have not been paid is because this fund has not been sufficient. The committee knows perfectly well what these loan-office certificates were given for. In the time of the Revolution, when the Government was without money, individuals were called upon to furnish provisions, material for cannon and the various munitions of war, and certificates were given for the payment of them. Many of those certificates have been settled. Many of them have been paid, but there are still outstanding between $20,000 and $30,000.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the certificate, to which he refers, is of this particular description?

Mr. STEVENS. It is of this particular description, and given to Curtis Grubb & Co., for furnishing cannon during the time of the Revolutionary war. I have a copy of it settled on the books. The only difficulty was, there was no appropriation to pay it.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman is under a very great mistake. I have here the letter from the accounting officer on that subject. There is but this one certificate, and the Committee on Ways and Means concluded, I believe unanimously with the Department, that these claims ought to be paid. No member of the committee hesitated about that; but we objected to the appropriation, or reappropriation, of $10,000, to let it run on for twenty years, as it has been doing before. There has been no certificate turned off for the want of appropriation—not a solitary one—and this is the only one left.

Mr. STEVENS. Let me explain. The reason why the certificate I have referred to has not been paid before that appropriation ran out, was, that it was lost, and could not be accounted for. It has been lately found, and sent on to me.

Mr. HOUSTON. In 1843 there were $37,589 59 standing to the credit of these outstanding loan-office certificates. Year upon year it was standing there, and in 1843, no certificates being presented, it was carried to the surplus fund. Now, instead of appropriating the gross amount, the committee believed it was the best way to appropriate for each claim as it came up. This was the only claim presented to the Department. The letter from the Department furnishes the calculation, and recommends the appropriation of $57 72 cents. There are a large number of claims outstanding, as shown by the books of the Department. The gentleman is right there; but there are many of them, probably four fifths, that will never be presented.

The question was put on the amendment submitted by Mr. HOUSTON, and it was agreed to.

The question then recurring on the amendment of the Senate as amended, it was adopted.

The eighteenth amendment, to insert at the end of the clause in page 13, appropriating $1,500 for the payment of Messrs. Babcock, Wilkinson, and Holcombe, for revising the laws of the Legislative Assembly of Minnesota, was read, as follows:

"Provided, That hereafter no expenses incurred by a Territorial Legislature shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, unless previously sanctioned by law."

Mr. HOUSTON. This amendment is attached by the Senate to a provision in the House bill making appropriations for codifying the laws of Minnesota, and for several other things not previously authorized by law. The restriction of the Senate, I think, is right.

Mr. MEADE. This strikes me as a very extraordinary amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless the gentleman submits an amendment, his remarks are not in order.

Mr. MEADE. My purpose in rising is to ask of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means what necessity there is for provision by law that no money shall be taken out of the Treasury contrary to law? Before he answers that question, I would suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means that his position is unfavorable to be heard by the House. I have been endeavoring to listen to his explanations, but he carries on a colloquy with those around him, and I cannot hear: I would wish the gentleman to get some other seat; for he is familiar with all these things, and I should like to hear the explanations of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, as to the necessity of providing by law that that shall not be done which is contrary to law.

Mr. HOUSTON. The necessity of this amendment proceeds from the fact that the Territorial Legislatures have been in the habit of incurring expenses and liabilities without authority of law; and I illustrated it by referring to the case in this bill. We appropriated, as the committee will remember, $1,500 to pay three attorneys in Minnesota for codifying the laws of that Territory. We appropriated other moneys to meet liabilities which the Territory of Minnesota have incurred before the money was asked for, or any law passed authorizing or justifying it. Now it is intended to put a stop to all that sort of expenditure, and that way of incurring liability, which will appeal to this Government and Congress in a way that Congress has never been known to resist—for they come here and say that they have already expended $1,500, and already incurred the liability. They have employed two attorneys to codify the laws, and have incurred a liability in various other things; and we are not able to resist an appeal from the Territorial Delegate for the appropriation of funds under such circumstances. This provision is intended to say to the Territories, that unless Congress passes a law authorizing particular expenditures to be made, they shall not incur that liability.

Mr. MEADE. I will ask the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means whether there has been any money paid out of the Treasury contrary to law, or not previously sanctioned by law, for these expenditures?

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman misapprehends the amendment. The amendment says, "that no expense incurred by the Territorial Legislature shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States unless previously sanctioned by law." This is not intended to apply to the payment of money out of the Treasury, but to the incurring of expense on the part of the Territorial Legislatures. The words are not very fully used.

Mr. MEADE. It seems to me that the amendment does not reach the case. If no money has been paid out of the Treasury in consequence of these liabilities incurred by Territorial Legislatures, then here is a corrective to an evil which does not exist. The evil I understand to be, that a Territorial Legislature goes on and incurs liabilities without having previously an appropriation made to meet them. If this is the evil to be remedied, that amendment should be changed in phraseology, so as to inhibit the Legislatures of Territories incurring such expenses.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the gentleman will permit me, I will read what is now the law—a proviso to the act of 1842—and to which it appears the Territorial Legislatures pay no regard. It reads as follows:

"Provided further, That the Legislative Assembly of no Territory shall hereafter, in any instance or under any pretense whatever, exceed the amount appropriated by Congress for its annual expenses."

Their disregard of this has made it necessary, in the opinion of the Senate, to reenact something of the same sort, and to put them in mind that there is such a law in force.

Mr. MEADE. Then I presume—

Mr. CARTTER. I will inquire whether the gentleman is in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is in order, if the Chair understood him correctly—if he made a motion to strike out this amendment.

Mr. MEADE. That is my motion. It seems to me that, by the general courtesy of the House, when we are trying to get the whole House into correct legislation upon any subject, a little consumption of time ought not to be objected to by members who are desirous of passing proper laws.

It is proposed, then, to reenact the law of 1842, which has been read by my worthy friend over the way, [Mr. JONES, of Tennessee.] And what is the necessity of it? It appears to me to be trifling with the wisdom of the country, that we should ever pass a law which is commonly disregarded, according to the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. It seems to me, that the only corrective is to refuse to pay the money. This declaration, that we will not pay will not be heeded so long as we do pay. This amendment is only a reenactment of the law of 1842.

Mr. SIBLEY. Is it in order to move an amendment to this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I submit the question to the Chair, whether the motion of the gentleman from Virginia to strike out the whole amendment, is itself in order?

The CHAIRMAN. If that question had been raised, the Chair would have decided that it was not in order.

Mr. JONES. Then it is not too late. I make that question now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must decide, then, that the motion of the gentleman from Virginia is out of order.

Mr. JONES. I presume, then, that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SIBLEY] can offer his amendment?

Mr. SIBLEY. I move to strike out of the proviso the words "unless previously sanctioned by law." I do this for the purpose of saying a few words upon the subject before the committee. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MEADE.] It is true there is a provision in the law of 1842, prohibiting the authorities of the several Territories from exceeding the amount appropriated by Congress for the support of the government therein. But, Mr. Chairman, that law was passed before the organization of any of the Territories now in existence, and it is highly desirable that it should be brought forward for the information of all concerned, as the renewed expression of a determination to restrict the Legislative Assemblies in the Territories within the limits prescribed in the annual appropriations made by Congress. In my opinion, the Senate clause should be retained as a standing admonition to the territorial authorities.

But inasmuch as that clause has been appended to the section in the deficiency bill, making provision for the payment of certain liabilities which had been incurred by the Legislature of Minnesota in advance of an appropriation, and the remarks of gentlemen who have preceded me would seem to intimate that there was something very censurable in that body for so doing, I beg leave to state, that each and every item provided for was introduced and pressed through this House and the Senate by me, with a full conviction that it was right and proper in itself, and ought to be paid. The Legislative Assembly did not desire to exceed the amount appropriated, but necessity prompted that body to anticipate the action of Congress, in appointing a commission to prepare a code of laws, in making arrangements to meet the expenses of printing and binding the volume for circulation among the people, and in providing for the payment of certain individuals who had performed valuable services more or less directly connected therewith. This was the exigency that justified the territorial authorities in the seeming disregard of the prohibitions of the law of 1842. The Legislature would not have asked, nor would I have been the medium of preferring a request that Congress should sanction, by its action, any anticipation of its usual appropriations, not rendered indispensable by the circumstances of the case. Admitting that the clause passed by the Senate is but a reiteration of an existing law, as contended by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MEADE,] there can no harm arise from such a repetition. The Territorial Assemblies will have their attention directed particularly to it as their future rule of action; and for my own part, I am not anxious to have the responsibility thrown upon me of bringing forward hereafter any claims for liquidation which may have arisen from the action of the Legislature of my own Territory, in exceeding the amount appropriated by Congress. I have found that hill very difficult to climb, and although I have happily reached the top in this particular case, the difficulties in the path are of too formidable a character to invite a second trial. I repeat the expression of my desire, that the Senate clause may be retained. I withdraw my amendment with the consent of the committee.

Mr. MEADE. It seems to me, then, that this amendment only proposes to intimate, in a very kind manner, to the Territorial Legislatures, that they have sinned heretofore, and being forgiven, they must not sin any more. That is just about the amount of it; and it seems to me that we are acting very childishly to employ our time here in such legislation as this. But it is said that it is only an admonition. I would ask the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, whether that admonition has not been already given, and why should it be repeated? If we have already said to the Territorial Legislatures, that though we will pay you this time, yet we will not do so any more, why keep on repeating that admonition?

Mr. SIBLEY. If the gentleman will allow me, I will state that no case has arisen thus far, which has required anything like a reprimand from Congress. These appropriations were right in themselves, but there was no authority or power on the part of the accounting officers to allow them.

Mr. MEADE. Suppose a like case should arise hereafter?

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say again—and the gentleman from Virginia knows this as well as any other member—that Congress has been always remarkably indulgent, and very liberal to the Territories. A very loose principle has therefore grown up, and there has been a disregard somewhat of the proviso in the law read by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES.] It becomes necessary, consequently, in the opinion of the Delegates themselves, that the Territorial Legislatures should be directed on the subject in some pointed manner, so as to show to them that they must not disregard existing laws hereafter, under no circumstances. I would like to know what harm the reenactment of such a provision can do?

Mr. MEADE. It seems to me that the best admonition to a Territorial Legislature would be through the Executive Department, and not by the reenactment of a law. The gentleman from Alabama says that we have been remarkably generous and liberal towards Territorial Legislatures under particular circumstances. Suppose the same circumstances were to occur again, and the same necessity should exist for these appropriations by this Territory, would we not be as ready to forgive that Legislature as we are now in the particular instance cited by the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. SIBLEY?] Surely this thing must be done by the Executive of the country. It is an act of supererogation. It is inserting a provision in your code without an object before it, and there is no way of executing it at all. But these things must be trusted to the Executive officers of the Government, and not to the legislative department.

Mr. SIBLEY. I withdraw my amendment. The question was then taken, and the amendment of the Senate was disagreed to.

The nineteenth amendment of the Senate, next in order, was stated by the the Chair to be the following, viz:

"Insert on page 13th, after line 289, 'for contingent expenses of the Senate, $137,775.'"

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The Committee on Ways and Means, I believe, recommend a non-concurrence in this amendment. Before that question is taken, though, I move to amend the proposition by striking out $137,775, and inserting $133,203 68. I will submit the facts of this case, so that each gentleman in the House, with the facts before him, may vote as he thinks proper. It will be recollected by reference to the last civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, that $150,000 were appropriated for the contingent expenses of the Senate. An account has been rendered showing how that money has been expended. I will read it:

Memorandum, showing, under general heads, how the appropriation for the contingent expenses of the Senate, for the year ending the 30th June, 1852, have been expended.

For Printing.....	$25,673 12
" Binding.....usual	$6,235 42

" Lithographing.....	17,903 19

" Congressional Globe, and other books.....	11,279 00

" Fuel, newspapers, furniture, advertising, upholstering, and all other expenses.....	4,566 32
	$150,000 00

The Senators, no doubt correctly, say that the expenditure of their contingent fund is a matter with which the House has nothing to do. I know that they are responsible for it, but if I know how it is spent—the items which compose this $287,775 of contingencies in one year for the Senate, I hold myself as much responsible for that expenditure as those who voted it out of that fund, after they had received it through the appropriation bill, into the hands of their Secretary.

Now, sir, here is a bill paid to the Messrs. Brown, hotel-keepers of this city, for Louis Kossuth and his suite, of $4,566 32. For that, I never intend knowingly to vote, directly or indirectly.

Several Voices. "Read the items."

Mr. JONES. The items are as follow:

To Board for Governor Kossuth and suite, having ten parlors and twenty-two chambers, thirteen and a half days—twenty-three persons.....$3,588 00

SUNDRIES—
Champagne, sherry, madeira, cigars, lemonade, bar-bill, washing, medicines, post office stamps, portage and messengers, hack-hire paid at different times, telegraphs, sugar, brandy, and whiskey in room, porter and ale, envelopes, barber's bill—amounting in all to... 658 82
Bill for carriages engaged for Governor and suite.. 319 50

$4,566 32

That is a bill for twenty-three persons during thirteen and a half days, amounting, I believe, to some $14 per day for each person.

Then, sir, I have here a bill furnished by the keepers of the National Hotel, at which Kossuth and his suite stopped on their return here from the South, when they were upon their own expenses. I believe there were then six persons; they stopped at the National Hotel about four days, and their bill was $74, being $3 08 per day for each person, when they were paying their own expenses, and something over $14 per day for each person when this Government was paying their expenses.

These are the facts, and some of the reasons, why this appropriation is asked for by the Secretary of the Senate. It is true, as I said before, that they are responsible for the manner in which this money has been expended, but—

Mr. FREEMAN. Has the money been paid?

Mr. JONES. It has been paid out of the $150,000 appropriated in the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill of last year.

Mr. FREEMAN. Then how are you to get it back?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CARTTER. I am opposed to the amendment. I think that the smallest work that this committee can engage in is to be hunting up the details of a bar bill. It is digging the smallest potatoes that this committee has ever been engaged in. [Laughter.] If the principles promulgated by Louis Kossuth in the United States, and the hatred generated by the promulgation of those principles, cannot be contested in a more manly manner than by crawling around bar-rooms to pick up wine bills, for the purpose of doing it, we had better let it alone.

Mr. JONES. Did the gentleman say that I had been crawling round bar-rooms?

Mr. CARTTER. No, sir; I did not.

Mr. JONES. I wish to ask the gentleman one question; would he vote to pay the bill?

Mr. CARTTER. I would vote to pay that bill if it was four times the amount it ought to be, and never disgrace this body by a cavil about it. That answer will be understood. We ought not to descend to it.

Sir, Louis Kossuth came here as the guest of the Senate. So far as this bill is concerned, he was under the supervision of a committee of that body—not dealing himself with these inn-keepers, but through the committee that the Senate had appointed for that purpose. This attempt to disgrace him, or the great and eternal principles which lie behind his mission, by scrutinizing his bills for brandy and ale, is striking too low, it appears to me, for the National Legislature.

Sir, I hope that the amendment will be agreed to, and for no other reason—if there is no other—than that this body may vindicate its manhood by refusing to descend to the details of a bill that has already been foreclosed by the action of the Senate, and that was incurred under the management of a committee of the Senate. The bill has been paid, and it can be revived here for no other purpose than as an attempt to play upon the low prejudices of the ignorant, in reference to the principles that Kossuth—pleasantly to some, and unpleasantly to others—has aided in sowing broadcast over this continent—thank God for it!

The question was then taken upon Mr. JONES's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The question then recurred upon agreeing to the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have just received a bill from the Senate, and I have had no time to confer either with the Secretary of the Senate, or with the chairman of the Finance Committee of that body in relation to it. But it may be that this is the proper place to offer an amendment for its payment, and I will, therefore, submit it to the House, and leave the House to dispose of it as it pleases. I move to insert after the word "dollar," in the third line of the amendment, the following, "and also forty-four thousand and thirty-seven dollars and twenty-two cents, for the payment and mileage of Senators for the Thirty-second Congress."

I will now send to the Clerk's desk, to be read, a statement by the Secretary of the Senate of the amount required, and so forth.

The Clerk read the statement, as follows:

OFFICE SECRETARY SENATE U. S., July 8, 1852.

SIR: I have the honor to state, that a further appropriation is needed for the compensation of Senators, as will be seen in the following statement:

The whole amount of mileage and per diem which accrued at the late special session of the Senate was—
Per diem.....$4,022 00
Mileage.....48,044 80

$52,066 80

Of this there has been paid.....45,216 80

Leaving unpaid.....6,850 00

The amount appropriated for the present session was.....$186,339 40

And there has been paid.....146,613 58

Leaving to be paid.....39,725 82

To which is to be added, for mileage of Senators who have taken their seats during the present session, not estimated for, and of a Senator who may be appointed from Kentucky.....7,500 40

Making a total of.....54,076 22

From which is to be deducted the balance in the hands of the Secretary of the Senate.....10,039 00

Leaving a deficiency to be supplied by further appropriation.....44,037 22

This estimate is made up to the 11th of August. If the session should continue beyond that time, a further appropriation, at the rate of $594 per day, will be required for the Senate.

The balance now in the hands of the Secretary may all be called for within the course of a few days.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

ASBURY DICKINS,

Secretary of the Senate.

HON. GEORGE S. HOUSTON,

Chairman Com. Ways and Means, H. R.

Mr. HOUSTON (resuming.) At the last session of Congress, the estimate for the pay and mileage of Senators, for this session of Congress, was $186,339 40. The Senate have a balance of a former appropriation of $12,141 38.

The amount appropriated in the civil and diplomatic bill of the last session of the Thirty-first Congress, was $19,040, making their available fund for the payment of their per diem and mileage $202,181 38, which would have been not only enough, but would have left a balance in the Treasury of some twenty or thirty thousand dollars, if it had not been for the special session of the Senate at the close of the last Congress. Many of the Senators, at that session, charged constructive mileage, which this committee understand as well as I do. If all the Senators should charge constructive mileage and per diem, it would amount to $52,066 80. Some of the Senators, however, did not claim constructive mileage, and of the appropriation which was made at the last Congress for the per diem and mileage of Senators for this session, the Secretary of the Senate has paid out for the constructive mileage and pay during the special session, $45,216 80. The claim of Senators for constructive mileage, creates a deficiency in the amount of money appropriated at the last session of Congress for the payment of their per diem and mileage at this session.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. That is one of the amendments for which I cannot vote. At the last session of Congress, in making an appropriation for the services of the fiscal year ending the 30th day of June, 1852, there was appropriated in the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, $835,000 for the per diem and mileage of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates, during that year, and extending up to some time in August. Of that $835,000, the Speaker of this House has drawn $645,000. The Secretary of the Senate has drawn $190,040. The Secretary of the Senate had in his possession twelve thousand and some odd dollars of the unexpended balance of the appropriation of the former year, making $202,000, round numbers, in his hands.

That amount, sir, would have been more than sufficient to have paid them up to this time, had not the mileage been estimated, and paid for the extra session commencing on the 4th of March, 1851. As will be seen, the Senate adjourned at twelve o'clock m. on the 4th of March, 1851, as those who were here well recollect; and immediately, I presume, without going out of the Senate Chamber, reassembled, under a summons of the President of the United States, to transact Executive business. They were in session ten days, and it will be seen from the estimates of the Secretary of the Senate, that the constructive mileage of that session, was $48,044 80. They now ask for $44,000 as a deficiency up to the 11th, I believe, of August. If the constructive mileage had not been taken, they would have still had a surplus of $4,000.

Mr. HOUSTON. Let me correct the gentleman's facts. Some of the Senators were entitled to mileage.

Mr. JONES. I beg the gentleman's pardon. No new Senators came in.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman is mistaken. Some new Senators did come in.

Mr. JONES. After the fact, that on the 3d of March, 1851, Congress passed, and the President approved, an act which expressly prohibits the Senators from taking mileage at the Executive session, which shall be called on the 4th of March, 1853, and at each succeeding period of four years thereafter, to pass upon the appointments of the new President, then coming into office; it does seem to me that such action on the part of the Senators, in taking constructive mileage, was wrong, and therefore I cannot vote for the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon adopting the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON.]

Mr. ROBBINS. Let the amendment be read. The amendment was accordingly read, as above inserted.

Mr. SWEETSER. Is it in order to offer an amendment to that amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the amendment to the amendment, and it was rejected.

The amendment of the Senate was then agreed to.

The amendment next in order (the twentieth) was read by the Clerk, as follows:

"For the payment of James W. Hale, of the city of New York, in full, for discharging the duties of dispatch agent, from September, 1849, to June, 1850, inclusive, the sum of $600."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I believe, Mr. Chairman, the next amendment in order is the one on page 21, "To enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay for the copies of the report of Doctor David Dale Owen, United States Geologist," &c.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a part of the amendment, which has just been adopted.

Mr. JONES. We did not pass upon it. We merely passed upon that part of the amendment relating to the contingent expenses of the Senate. When that was read through, the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON,] the chairman of the committee, proposed his amendment. It is true that it is put down as one amendment, but we take it up by clauses.

The CHAIRMAN. A vote on part of an amendment could not be taken.

Mr. JONES. But the Chair will not certainly decide that an amendment would be passed without reading it, and without a vote upon it?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment may be read again, though the vote must be taken upon an amendment as a whole.

Mr. JONES. Cannot we call for a division of an amendment? By turning to the rules you will see that we have a right to. I call for a division of the amendment.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of Connecticut. The first part of the amendment was read; and by general consent we can take up the amendment by a division of it.

Mr. JONES. Then I move to strike out that part of the Senate amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman should have done that before the vote was taken.

Mr. JONES. The vote has not been taken, because the amendment has not been read to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides, that the amendment may be now read as a whole; and if the House has labored under an error, the amendment can be reconsidered.

Mr. JONES. I ask the Chair to refer to the rule concerning a division of a question.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of Connecticut. I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair, that this amendment cannot be divided.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest, that the question upon which the gentleman from Connecticut would take an appeal is not, at this time, before the committee. The Clerk informs the Chair that, through inadvertence, the whole amendment was not read. The remainder of it will now be read.

Mr. JONES. I ask the Chair, if he has any doubts about the propriety of dividing the amendment, to refer to the rule.

The Clerk then read the remainder of the amendment above referred to, as follows:

"To enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay for the copies of the report of Dr. David Dale Owen, United States Geologist, on the geology of Iowa and Wisconsin, and Minnesota Territory, heretofore ordered to be executed for the use of the Senate, under the special direction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, $31,218 75: Provided, That no more than fifty cents a copy shall be paid for the binding of the book.

"To enable the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay for three thousand five hundred copies of the report of Dr. David Dale Owen, on the geology of Iowa, and Wisconsin, and Minnesota Territory, ordered by a resolution of the House of Representatives, to be executed under the special direction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, $16,187 50: Provided, That no more than fifty cents a copy shall be paid for the binding of the book.

"For contingent expenses of the Library of Congress, $800."

Mr. JONES. I ask for a separate vote upon the last part of the amendment, the one which has just been read.

The CHAIRMAN. What rule did the gentleman refer to?

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] that it is in his power to move to strike out any part of the amendment which he wishes to vote upon.

Mr. JONES. The rule I referred to is the 53d. It is as follows:

"Any member may call for a division of a question, which shall be divided, if it comprehends propositions in substance so distinct that, one being taken away, a substantial proposition shall remain for the decision of the House."

I think this is a case clearly within the rule. The propositions are separate and distinct, and have no connection with each other whatever. The first branch of the amendment has been voted upon, and concurred in, and the other branches must be considered.

The second branch of the amendment is for printing and binding the geological reports of David Dale Owen, ordered under a resolution of the Senate.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman propose to amend it?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir; I propose to strike it out altogether. It was ordered that this document should be printed, under the supervision of the General Land Office. That was construed by the Commissioner, and perhaps by the Secretary of the Senate—but I do not know how that is—that it authorized him to go and make a separate contract for the printing of this document, when, sir, the law provided that the printer to Congress should do this work. There was no authority in the resolution, ordering it to be printed under the supervision of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, that he should have power to make a separate contract. The only object, I conceive, that was intended by directing it to be printed under the superintendence of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, was that he might have the correction of the proof sheets, and see that it was properly and correctly printed.

The Committee on Ways and Means think it should be paid for, as other printing of Congress is, out of the contingent fund of the two Houses.

The first item is to pay for the printing and binding the Senate part of the document, and the second for printing and binding the House part.

Mr. LOCKHART. Mr. Chairman, the amendment now proposed to be stricken out of the bill under consideration is the appropriation necessary to pay the expenses of publishing the report of Dr. David Dale Owen on the geology of Iowa, Wisconsin, and Minnesota. As a geologist Dr. Owen has but few equals—probably no superior in this or any other country. The work, sir, is one of very great merit. As a literary production it will take a very high rank; as a scientific work it will have no superior in that branch of science. To the artisan and others who may hereafter wish to settle upon the great coal-fields or mineral lands of the Mississippi valley, this report will be of incalculable value. If I understand correctly the objections which the honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] urges against this appropriation, they are—first, that the Commissioner of the General Land Office has exceeded his authority in procuring the work to be done by any other than the public printer and binder; and secondly, that if he had this authority, the publication ought to be paid out of the contingent fund of each House. In answer to the first objection, it will only be necessary to read the resolution of the Senate and House, to show that the Commissioner had ample and complete authority to do precisely as he has done. The Clerk will please read the resolution of the Senate and then the resolution of the House.

They were read as follows:

"IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,?"

"March 13, 1851."

"Resolved, That the forthcoming report of Dr. David Dale Owen, United States Geologist, on the geology of Iowa and Wisconsin, and also the forthcoming report of Messrs. Foster and Whitney, United States Geologists, in relation to the iron region of Lake Superior, in Michigan, be ordered to be printed, together with the maps, diagrams, sketches of scenery, and illustrations which will accompany the same respectively, and that the work be executed during the recess of Congress, under the special direction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in time to be presented to Congress at an early day of the next session."

"HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,?"

"February 11, 1852."

"Resolved, That there be printed for the use of this House three thousand five hundred copies of the final report of Doctor D. D. Owen, on the geology of Wisconsin, Iowa and Minnesota, and that such be executed in the same form and style, and under the same special contract which has been authorized by the Senate, to be entered into by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and that five hundred copies be set apart for the disposal of said office."

These resolutions show in the most clear and unequivocal manner that the Commissioner has not exceeded his authority. The Senate resolution, it will be observed, required the Commissioner to have the work executed in time to be presented to Congress at an early day of the session of the present Congress. It was well known to Congress, and to the Commissioner, that the public printer could not do this work if he would, so it is idle to say that the public printer should have been employed.

As to the second objection, I have only to say, that the publication has been under the personal supervision and inspection of Doctor Owen, who has done all in his power to have the work done as cheaply as it could have been done in the United States. I have a specimen before me, which I ask members to examine. It will be one of the best, neatest, and cheapest publications ever made by order of Congress. The work is now nearly finished, and the mechanics, and those who furnished materials, are asking for their pay. It is due to them—it is due to Doctor Owen, and to the Commissioner of the Land Office, that the appropriation should pass. I therefore most respectfully ask the committee to vote down the motion to strike out, as proposed by the Committee on Ways and Means.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to state an additional fact. This, I believe, was considered by the Committee on Ways and Means as properly belonging to the contingent fund of each House. If the committee will look at the clause, they will see there is used a singular phraseology by the Senate. It appears they have ordered three, or four, or five times as many documents as we have, and here they put in the number of documents we have ordered; but when they come to those they have ordered, they only say the copies, without putting in really how many. Now, I am not disposed, so far as I am concerned, to seem to diminish when we do not diminish the contingent fund of the two Houses. Whenever we incur liability to come out of the contingent fund, I want it to come out of that fund. If this claim be rejected in this bill it will come up to be paid out of the contingent fund, just like any other printing ordered by either House—like your commercial document, or any other document ordered by the votes of the two Houses of Congress, to be printed—which each House must pay out of its contingent fund. This is only an effort on the part of others to seem to diminish, and not to present the amount of expenditure out of the contingent fund to the country. In the way of contingencies, both Houses are expending enormous sums. Such is the case especially, in the Senate. I am, therefore, for letting the contingent fund show this; and if this be added to it, and there can be no question it must, let it appear as a contingency. Here is an appropriation of some $40,000 or $50,000 of additional contingencies for the Senate, and let it come out of their contingent fund. Let our contingencies be paid for out of our contingent fund. Let the country see what we are doing.

Mr. LOCKHART. This work, I desire to say, will be ready the 5th of the present month.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee is to strike out the whole of these two clauses. I propose to amend them before they are struck out.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. My proposition is to strike out the amount to be appropriated. The Committee on Ways and Means recommend non-concurrence in the amendment.

Mr. STANTON. I propose the following amendment—

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment to the gentleman's amendment is not in order.

Mr. STANTON. I do not propose an amendment to this amendment. I propose to amend the clauses before they are stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's amendment is to strike out $31,218 75. That amendment is now under consideration, and until acted upon, further amendments will not be in order.

Mr. JONES. My first amendment is to strike out $31,218 75; the other one is to strike out $16,187 50.

The CHAIRMAN. The other one is not now under consideration. The question has been divided, and the first subdivision is alone under consideration by the committee.

Mr. STANTON. What becomes of the rest of the clause?

The CHAIRMAN. It will be subsequently considered by the committee.

The question was taken on the motion to strike out $31,218 75, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. FITCH. I move to strike out the proviso in relation to the binding, and I do so for the purpose of obviating one of the objections. I understand that the Committee on Ways and Means objects to this appropriation. They say this money should be paid out of the contingent fund of the respective Houses. That contingent fund cannot, under the law, be appropriated for the binding of any document which costs over twelve and a half cents, that being the price paid to the contractors for the Congressional binding. Now, sir, it is well known Congressional documents are octavo volumes.

Mr. HOUSTON. With the permission of the gentleman I want to correct a fact. Has the gentleman any authority for what he has stated? If he has I should like to see it. If the contingent fund be not restricted you can have the binding done by one bindery as well as another. The restriction is not there.

Mr. FITCH. It is a restriction which I understand the gentleman himself to have made. He stated a short time since, not in debate, as an objection to the payment of this money out of the contingent fund, that the contract for the Congressional binding would stand in the way—which contract provides the binding shall be done for twelve and a half cents a volume. This contract is for sixty cents a volume, and it is that for this obvious reason: the contract for Congressional binding contemplates only the binding of octavo volumes. This is a quarto volume, which cannot be bound for twelve and a half cents. The estimate was fifty cents, but the contract was for sixty cents per volume, because in the estimate the cost of stitching, folding, and arranging the illustrations were not included, which were ten cents additional. Now this objection to the payment out of the contingent fund for that binding would present itself at once to the House. I propose to strike that out, because the contract has been for sixty cents. The contract placed that price for the reasons I have already stated.

Now, the volume will include, when published, and it will be published about the middle of next month,—the results of four years field service. It includes the geology of a country four times larger than New York. It is of vast interest not only to science but agriculture. It contains that very species of knowledge which agriculturists, in that vast region, desire to obtain—a species of knowledge infinitely better for agriculturists than nine tenths of the useless trash we publish in our reports from the Patent Office.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I rise to oppose this amendment, for the purpose of getting information from the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, to satisfy my mind with reference to the objection he makes to these two appropriations. He says they ought to be paid out of the contingent fund. I ask him whether they are estimated for in the contingent fund? If they are, then this will be a double appropriation, and ought to be stricken out. If they are not estimated for in the contingent fund, certainly this appropriation ought to be passed; but I can see no objection to passing an appropriation explaining in the bill what the appropriation is for, whether it come out of the contingent fund, or any other fund. This provision explains the fact that the Senate have ordered a certain number of these documents to be printed. If it be paid out of the contingent fund, that information will appear upon the accounts, and not in the law itself; so that this is better than if it were paid out of the contingent fund.

Mr. HOUSTON. In reply to the gentleman's question, I will say this: I have not the items of it before me, but this contingent fund may be as well applied to that as to the Kossuth or any other item. Let me go further. It is absolutely essential and proper this should come out of the contingent fund, for the reason that these expenditures were not incurred by joint resolution of the two Houses. The House has incurred its own expenditure by a simple resolution it passed ordering the printing, and it should be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. STANTON. That is true. There is an obligation upon the Government; if this money is to be paid, it should be paid now. I understand this appropriation is a deficiency. This is one of those deficiencies which must be paid.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to state, with the permission of the gentleman, another fact for the consideration of the committee. There is now presented a claim on the part of the contractor for the binding of Congress, for the binding of these documents. He claims that they are included in his contract. He claims that the Commissioner of the Land Office, or whoever managed this matter, has made a contract for binding, which should go to him; and that there was no authority of law for the contract,—that the resolution does not authorize him to make a contract for binding. I desire to know whether, in the settlement of the accounts of the binder under contract to this Congress, we will not have to pay for the binding again?

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. That does not alter the state of the question. Here is a contract made by authority of the Senate and by authority of the House, and the work has been done.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. If the gentleman from Tennessee will allow me to explain that matter about binding, I will do it in a moment, and satisfy the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Houston,] he is under a mistake with regard to it. A contract was entered into with certain binders to do the binding for the House of Representatives and the Senate, at twelve and a half cents per volume. They were to do that description of binding usually done for Congress, not including this.

Mr. HOUSTON. He expressly claims this at double his contract price.

The question was then taken on the motion to strike out the proviso, and it was disagreed to.

The question then recurring upon the adoption of the second subdivision of the amendment, it was taken and agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask the Clerk to read the third subdivision of the nineteenth amendment.

It was then read as follows:

"To enable the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay for 3,500 copies of the report of Dr. David Dale Owen, on the geology of Iowa, Wisconsin, and Minnesota Territory, ordered by a resolution of the House of Representatives, to be executed under special direction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, $16,187 50: Provided, That no more than fifty cents per copy shall be paid for the binding of the book."

Mr. JONES. I move to strike out the amount of $16,187 50. I wish merely to state, that by reading the Senate resolution it will be seen that it did not authorize the making of any special contract, but merely ordered the printing of this document under the special direction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. As I have stated before, the House resolution refers to a contract which had been made under the authority of the Senate resolution. I will further state, that if the Senate resolution had directed a contract to be made, one House cannot repeal a law which has been passed by both, and approved by the President. These resolutions were separately passed by the respective Houses, and neither of them says one word about the binding.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I oppose the striking out that provision in this resolution, and I do it for the purpose of getting the opportunity to explain this matter about the printing. The gentleman from Alabama labors under a great misapprehension. The Joint Committee on Printing made a contract with two binders of this city, one to do the binding for the House of Representatives, and the other to do the binding for the Senate, and the prices were established at which they stipulated to do the usual binding. They made this contract with these gentlemen, and they undertook to do the work at twelve and a half cents a volume. The Commissioner of the Land Office, being aware of the existence of this contract with these gentlemen, and knowing the duty of the contractors under it, and believing that he had the power to make a contract for binding these books, as he was intrusted with the printing and publishing of them under the resolution of the Senate, made a contract with a binder in the city of New York.

Mr. LOCKHART. Here is a paragraph from Dr. Owen's letter:

"The binding has been contracted for in a substantial manner for sixty cents. This includes stitching, folding, and arranging illustrations, which are not taken into the account in the estimate at fifty cents. The Commissioner considered that the words of the resolution required that he should make special contracts for the whole publication, including, of course, the binding. The public binder contracts to bind for twelve and a half cents per volume, and it was utterly impossible to bind quarto volumes for that price. Hence the necessity for making a special contract."

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. When this question arose in the Joint Committee on Printing, it was believed by the members of the committee that the contractors of the House were entitled to it. They were so informed, and a resolution was passed authorizing them to do it, but they had sagacity enough to see, if they did it themselves they would lose money upon it. They came before the committee and protested against its being given to them, for they could not do it for less than sixty-two and a half cents, on account of the expensive style of binding; and as their manner of binding was altogether in a different style, they desired to be relieved from all obligation to do it. The committee then confirmed the contract made with a New York house by a formal resolution, which is on record upon their Journal. I believe they did it under the sanction or authority of some resolution passed by the Senate.

The question was then taken upon Mr. Jones's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The question then recurring upon this subdivision of the Senate amendment, it was taken, and agreed to.

The fourth branch of the nineteenth amendment of the Senate, appropriating $800 for contingent expenses of the Library of Congress, was then taken up and agreed to.

The twentieth amendment was then read, as follows:

"For the payment to James W. Hale, of the city of New York, in full for discharging the duties of a dispatch-agent, from September, 1849, to June, 1850, inclusive, the sum of $600."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I will state, that the committee recommend a non-concurrence with this amendment, for the reason that it is a private claim, and there is no authority in the law to pay for such services, and this matter has no business in a general appropriation bill.

Mr. BRIGGS. I hope the committee will concur in this amendment for the payment to Mr. Hale the small sum of $600 for services actually rendered to the Government as a dispatch-agent, during the inability of the Government dispatch-agent, Matthew Davis, to do that duty, owing to infirmity of age and indisposition. Mr. Hale faithfully performed that service, under the sanction of the Secretary of State, Mr. Webster, who has given a recommendation to the committee of the Senate, that Mr. Hale was entitled to receive this compensation. The Senate so considered it, and they have amended our bill by inserting the sum of $600, as compensation for his services, and I hope the House will not refuse to allow it. It cannot be viewed in the light of a private claim, and I really trust, that this committee will not reject the amendment of the Senate providing so small a pittance for a person who has faithfully discharged his duty to the Government.

The question was then taken upon the amendment, and it was agreed to.

The twenty-first amendment was then read, as follows:

"Page 14, line 311, after the word 'dollars,' insert:

"Provided, That there shall be no further geological survey prosecuted in Oregon unless authorized by law."

Mr. HOUSTON. The committee propose an amendment to that amendment. They propose to strike out the words "in Oregon," in the second line, so that the prohibition will be general.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Do the Committee on Ways and Means propose to concur with the proviso in the Senate's amendment?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEPHENS. "Provided that there shall be no geological survey, except authorized by law." What do you propose?—that a man should not go into Territories and make a voluntary survey?

Mr. HOUSTON. The object of the amendment is to prevent such surveys, unless Congress shall pass a law expressly requiring, authorizing, or directing a survey to be made.

Mr. STEPHENS. The proviso, as it stands, makes a broad declaration that there shall be no geological surveys in Oregon unless ordered by law. The committee propose to strike out Oregon, and then there will be a general denunciation, and there will be no geological surveys except those authorized by law.

Mr. HOUSTON. We have permitted it to remain in the language employed by the Senate. As a matter of course, we do not pretend to say that the gentleman from Georgia shall not survey geologically whenever he pleases, or any other man.

Mr. STEPHENS. I will ask the gentleman if he goes and makes a voluntary survey, will he be indicted for the misdemeanor?

Mr. HOUSTON. Oh, no.

Mr. STEPHENS. Why, then, say so. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOUSTON. This amendment is intended to prevent any surveys being carried on or directed by the Departments of Government without authority of law.

Mr. STEPHENS. I am opposed to it. If we have to restrain Departments from doing what they have no authority to do—if we have to come to that pass, I think it is time that we should consider a serious remedy. If the Departments carry on surveys, or anything else, without authority of law, impeach them. Have we got to that pass that we have to restrain them by saying that they shall not do so and so unless authorized by law?

Mr. HOUSTON. This particular appropriation, and this particular proviso, proceeds from the fact that there was an appropriation for geological surveys in some of the Northwestern Territories, and the balance of that appropriation, which was unexpended in these geological surveys, was turned over to Oregon, and without any authority of law whatever. The geological surveys were prosecuted in Oregon, to the absorption of the balance of the appropriation, which was intended for another country, while there was no law even authorizing a geological survey. That is the reason the Senate adopted this amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS. I would inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, who directed that survey?

Mr. HOUSTON. I think it was under the direction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, whoever has the proper control of it.

A VOICE. The Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. HOUSTON. The Secretary of the Interior; but under the immediate direction of the head of the Land Office.

Mr. STEPHENS. I see no use for the proviso, and I hope the House will not concur in it. If there is any misdirection of the public funds in the public offices of this country, I hope the subject will be brought before the House for consideration, not by provisos, but by some more energetic means.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The Senate adopted this amendment, "that there shall be no further geological surveys prosecuted in Oregon unless provided by law." The amendment of the committee proposes to strike out the words "in Oregon," and not to apply this exclusively to Oregon, but to make it read "that there shall be no further geological surveys prosecuted unless authorized by law." The Senate propose to limit it to Oregon, but the Committee on Ways and Means propose to make it apply generally.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. JONES. Is it in order to move a substitute, "that there shall be no further geological surveys prosecuted under authority of the United States unless provided by law?"

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment will be in order after the question is taken upon the amendment now before the committee.

Mr. STEPHENS. The object of the gentleman will be answered by providing that no geological survey will be paid for out of the public Treasury unless authorized by law. To make a general declaration that there shall be no geological surveys, unless authorized by law, seems to me to be absurd. I hope the whole will be stricken out.

The question was then put upon the amendment, and on a division there were—ayes 47, noes 37.

Mr. SWEETSER demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. STANTON, of Tennessee, and FREEMAN, were appointed.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 74, noes not counted.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MEADE. It seems to me that some further revision of this clause is necessary, to make it intelligible. It would be gathered from that amendment that the Committee on Ways and Means and also the Senate thought that there had been expenditures upon works of this kind without the authority of law. Now, I suppose that charity requires us to admit that the officers of the Government supposed they had authority to make those expenditures. Well, this clause is intended as a declaration of the wish of Congress hereafter, and, in order to do that it seems to me it is necessary to insert some other words than those which are now embraced in the amendment. I agree with the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS;] that the clause as it stands has no meaning in it; or, if it has any, it seems to say that heretofore the officers of the Government have been in the habit of making unlawful expenditures for this object.

The CHAIRMAN. What amendment does the gentleman from Virginia propose?

Mr. MEADE. I believe that the word "Oregon" has been stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. It has.

Mr. MEADE. Then I move to strike out the word, "authorized," and insert, in lieu thereof, "hereafter directed," so as to make it read, "Provided, That there shall be no further geological survey prosecuted unless hereafter directed by law."

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I would suggest to the gentleman that it would be better to amend the clause by striking out the word "prosecuted," and inserting after the word "survey," the words "paid for out of the Treasury of the United States."

The section would then read—

Provided, That there shall be no further geological survey paid for out of the Treasury of the United States unless authorized by law.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am willing to agree to that amendment.

Mr. MEADE. That phraseology would be liable to the very same exceptions which have been made to the clause as it stands; because it would admit the supposition that heretofore there had been money paid out of the Treasury that was not authorized by law. Now, I think it is unnecessary that that reflection should be cast upon the Executive at this time, if he has remained under the impression that these surveys were allowed by law. If we insert the words which I propose to insert, it will be a direction to the Executive hereafter, in relation to its duty, without pronouncing a condemnation on its course heretofore.

I would, therefore, suffer the clause to stand as it is, with the amendment which I propose. It will then read, "that there shall be no further geological surveys prosecuted, unless hereafter directed by law." That is, that the surveys which have heretofore been prosecuted may have been directed by laws heretofore existing; but that now there shall be no further prosecution of surveys unless there shall be subsequent directions. That, it seems to me, will cover the object of the Committee on Ways and Means, and of the Senate, without admitting the supposition that heretofore there have been improper expenditures.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEADE] joined the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] in criticising the language which the Senate has seen fit to employ; but now he proposes to amend that language, and put it precisely in the same condition as was criticised by the gentleman from Georgia. The criticism of the gentleman from Georgia was, that this would be a law against all geological surveys, and now the gentleman from Virginia proposes that there shall be no geological surveys, unless they are hereafter directed by law to be made, which would leave it in precisely the same condition. The criticism of the gentleman from Georgia would hold good on the language of the gentleman from Virginia, just as well as on that of the Senate amendment.

Mr. MEADE. I will obviate that objection by modifying my amendment so as to read, "that there shall be no further geological survey by the Government of the United States, unless hereafter directed by law."

Mr. HOUSTON. That will obviate the difficulty. I think the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia would accomplish the same end. I am willing to take either of them. I think the amendment, or some modification of it, ought to be adopted.

There is an appropriation in this bill, as I stated before, for a deficiency for surveys in Oregon, after expending a balance of what was previously appropriated for some of the Territories in the Northwest.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Have the surveys in those Territories been completed?

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand that they are completed, and that a great part of the money that was intended for those Territories has been expended in Oregon.

Mr. SIBLEY. With the permission of the gentleman from Alabama I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that those surveys have all been completed.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand that the surveys have all been completed, and that there was a balance left. That balance has been taken without the authority of law, and expended in Oregon.

The question was then taken upon Mr. MEADE's amendment to the amendment, and it was agreed to.

The question recurred on agreeing to the amendment of the Senate as amended, and, being put, the amendment as amended was agreed to.

The twenty-second amendment, to come in on page 14, after line 317, coming up next in order, was considered and agreed to, as follows:

"To enable the Secretary of State to pay to William E. Anderson, for the loss of time and expense incurred in coming from Rio Janeiro to New York, under the direction of the American Minister at the Brazilian Court, to testify against certain persons alleged to have been engaged in the slave trade, $250."

The twenty-third amendment was then considered and agreed to, as follows:

"Page 14, lines 324 and 325: After the word 'fifty-one' strike out '$1,800,' and insert '$2,253,' so as to make the clause read as follows:

"For compiling, printing, and binding the Biennial Register for 1851, in addition to the amount appropriated per act of March, 1851, $2,253."

The Clerk then read the twenty-fourth amendment, to come in on page 15, at the end of line 337, as follows:

"And also a sum not exceeding $10,734 65, is hereby appropriated to pay Adam Boyd Hamilton, according to contract, for printing 20,000, and binding 1,810 copies, of 396 pages each, of the Register's Report of the Commerce and Navigation of the United States for 1851."

Mr. HOUSTON. The Committee on Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence in that amendment, and will state the reason why.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that it is not in order to discuss the amendment, unless the gentleman proposes an amendment to it.

Mr. HOUSTON. Well, sir, I move to strike out the amendment, or to non-concur in it. At the first session of the Thirty-first Congress, a law was passed which provided that the commerce and navigation document should be, thereafter, printed under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. After that time, the Secretary of the Treasury made a contract with Gideon & Co. for the printing of the document, but when the day of payment came, they found that Congress had made no appropriation for it. At the second session of the Thirty-first Congress, Congress made an appropriation to pay Gideon & Co. for printing the commerce and navigation document, but at the bottom of that appropriation they inserted the following proviso:

"Provided, That hereafter said reports be printed by the public printer as other documents."

The Committee on Ways and Means believe that the public printer was bound under the law which I have just read, to print this document under his contract with Congress, but by this amendment of the Senate, it is intended to pay him the same rate of compensation that was paid under the contract of Gideon & Co. with the Secretary of the Treasury, for the session before last. The committee, therefore, recommend that this appropriation be stricken out or disagreed to. They believe that Congress, in saying that thereafter said report be printed by the public printer as other documents, intended to say that it should be a part of the printing which the public printer of Congress should do under his contract. After that law was enacted, this contract was made with Hamilton.

Mr. MEADE. I am opposed to the motion of the gentleman from Alabama. The gentleman may be right in his interpretation of that law, but I doubt very much whether, when this contract was made by Hamilton, he contemplated that it would include printing of this description. If gentlemen will look to the contract that was entered into with Boyd Hamilton, they will see that only such printing as might be ordered by Congress was contemplated in that contract. Well, now, sir, we know very well that Congress is in the habit of ordering printing by simple resolution or motion; it is not done under an express provision of law; and I think it is very likely that when the contract was entered into with this gentleman, he did not contemplate that it was to embrace printing which might be directed to be done by the Secretary of the Treasury. At any rate, as it is a matter of doubtful construction, and as the contract which we have made with this contractor is complained of by him as being a very hard one, I think it becomes us, under the circumstances, not to be too rigid in the construction of that contract, and wherever there is an opportunity of allowing him to make something more than the contract calls for, unless it is clearly in violation of that contract, I am for extending to him that indulgence. I hope it will be the pleasure of the committee to do it in this case. When we advert to the terms of the contract, and look at the different periods of time when this contract was made, and when the law was passed in relation to the manner in which this printing should be done, it is calculated to create a belief in the minds of all who are disposed to do ample justice, that this class of printing was not contemplated by the contractor. I therefore trust, that in view of the considerations which I have thrown out, it will be the pleasure of the committee to allow him the difference between this appropriation, and what he would have received under his contract; to let him have the few additional hundred dollars which he would get under this provision.

Mr. HOUSTON. With the permission of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MEADE,] I wish to say that the date of the contract, and the date of the bond can make no difference, though I think it is as I have stated. As Congress has the right to declare what shall be the printing of Congress, it has the right to increase the printing. It has the right to add documents if it choose to the documents heretofore printed as Congress printing; and the public printer, though his contract might then be in operation, could not object to it. But such I understand not to have been the case here. Now, if the gentleman bases himself upon the ground of a gratuity, then I have no more to say. If the House chooses to put this upon the ground of a gratuity to a gentleman who has a hard contract, I have no more to say, but the House should be aware, at least, of one fact—

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. What is the difference?

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand the difference; and it was not for the purpose of saving the difference alone in this particular case, that the committee recommended a non-concurrence in the amendment, but that we might give proper construction to a law passed by Congress, to present to the House our precise construction of a law of the last Congress. Now, it is for the committee to do as it thinks proper.

Mr. MEADE. I would call the attention of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] to the words contained in the amendment, "to pay to Adam Boyd Hamilton, according to contract, for printing twenty thousand." Now, this contract was certainly entered into by Hamilton with the Secretary of the Treasury; and what do those words mean?

Mr. HOUSTON. There was no evidence before the Committee on Ways and Means at all, that there was any contract. On the contrary, we were furnished with a copy of the prices which were paid under the contract between Gideon & Co. and the Secretary of the Treasury. I have these papers now.

Mr. MEADE. Then the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means cannot tell us why these words were used by the Senate in their amendment. And in the absence of any knowledge upon his part in relation to the reason of their being there, I must presume the Senate had some cause for inserting them. Therefore there must have been a contract with the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. ALLISON. Is it in order to offer an amendment at this time?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. ALLISON. I then move to strike out "sixty-five cents." I make that motion for the purpose of saying a few words in relation to the public printer.

It strikes me, sir, that the public printer is likely to suffer from the construction put upon the law that governs the contract.

Now, sir, when it can be made to operate against the public printer, this House has so construed it, and taken from him the printing which he was entitled to under the contract; and now, when we have the opportunity of doing him something like justice, we are to construe the law against him, and take away from him that which we are willing to give to other printers.

I was glad to hear the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEADE] say a word in favor of this man, who has been so hardly dealt with, as I conceive, by this House. I think, sir, when we look at the whole ground, when we look at the manner in which this public printer has been treated by us, when we consider that we have taken from him a large amount of printing and placed it in the hands of other printers, it is a case which appeals to every member of this body, that we should not deal harshly with him, and that we ought, without hesitation, to give him the same amount given to other persons.

Mr. HOUSTON. The Senate sent us all the papers they had before them. Here is all the evidence, and there is no evidence of a contract at all. On the contrary, I understand from a gentleman who is a member of the Committee on Public Printing, in the Senate, that there was no contract with Hamilton upon that subject. Therefore upon that authority I say—and it is good authority—that there was no special contract between the Secretary of the Treasury and this printer, at all.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that I understand the Secretary of the Treasury ordered this printing to be done by this gentleman, because he could do it more conveniently than it could be done by any other person at the time. He merely contracted that he was to be paid what was reasonable. It is not stated to be any portion of the regular printing of Congress, but it is a special job, contracted to be done, by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I would like to know, if that is the gentleman's construction, whether he has ever read the law of the last session of Congress? That law says that that very report shall be printed by the public printer. The Secretary did not make the contract with him upon the ground that it was more convenient, but because it was to be printed by the public printer like other documents.

I am perfectly willing, if gentlemen desire to put this upon the ground of charity; but I assure you that if you give the construction proposed to the law providing for this particular printing, you will have to pass another.

Mr. MEADE. What is the motion?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. ALLISON,] to strike out "sixty-five cents."

Mr. ALLISON. I withdraw it.

Mr. MEADE. I propose to add one dollar to the appropriation. The House will bear in mind that they have to determine this question, as between the Committee on Ways and Means and the whole Senate of the United States. The Senate sanctioned the report of their committee who reported this amendment. Of course they knew what they were about. Now, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means comes up here, and moves to reject the Senate amendment, and calls upon the House to listen to his testimony, and to disregard that of the sixty members of the other House. I say now, Mr. Chairman, that inasmuch as the weight of testimony seems to be on the side of the appropriation, we who act somewhat in the dark will lean to that weight of testimony, especially as in doing so, we will be relieving a man whose onerous contract we all know, and will give him a very small mite in addition to that which he is receiving; and I hope the House, in this state of things, will exercise its judgment in favor of this man, and against the committee.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to make a statement which it would have been well for the gentleman to have known before he made his speech. It is this. In conversation with the chairman of the Committee on Finance, in the Senate, on yesterday morning, I called his attention to this very provision of the law, and he told me that that provision of the law had entirely escaped him.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. MEADE, and it was not agreed to.

The amendment of the Senate was then agreed to.
